FOREWORD

THE EUROPA YEAR BOOK was first published in 1926. Since 1960 it has appeared in annual two-volume editions, and has become established as an authoritative reference work, providing a wealth of detailed information on the political, economic and commercial institutions of the world. This year's edition appears for the second time in a completely new format using computerized photo-typesetting.

Volume I deals with international organizations and the countries of Europe, as well as providing the first part of the alphabetical survey of the rest of the world, from Afghanistan to Burundi. Volume II lists the remaining countries of the world, from Cameroon to Zimbabwe.

Readers are referred to our regional books THE MIDDLE EAST AND NORTH AFRICA, AFRICA SOUTH OF THE SAHARA and THE FAR EAST AND AUSTRALASIA for additional information on the geography, history and economy of these areas.

The information is revised annually by a variety of methods, including direct mailing to all the institutions listed. Many other sources are used, such as national statistical offices, government departments and diplomatic missions. The editors thank the innumerable individuals and organizations throughout the world whose generous co-operation in providing current information for this edition is invaluable in presenting the most accurate and up-to-date material available, and acknowledge particular indebtedness for material from the following publications: the United Nations' Demographic Yearbook, Statistical Yearbook and Yearbook of Industrial Statistics; the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations' Production Yearbook, Yearbook of Fishery Statistics and Yearbook of Forest Products; and The Military Balance 1984–85, published by the International Institute for Strategic Studies, 23 Tavistock Street, London, WC2E 7NQ.

April 1985.

Recent History (p. 2379)

In March 1985 Pius Wingti resigned as Deputy Prime Minister in order to challenge Michael Somare for the post of Prime Minister through a parliamentary motion expressing no confidence in him. Somare survived the motion of no confidence by gaining the support in the National Parliament of the Melanesian Alliance (MA) party and the National Party (NP), in addition to that of his own Pangu Pati. In return for their support, Somare granted the MA and the NP a total of four of the 28 posts in the National Executive Council, in association with a minor ministerial reshuffle. Fr John Momis, the leader of the MA, became Deputy Prime Minister.

Preliminary results from voting in the presidential election indicated that Alan García Pérez, candidate of the Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana (APRA), had received over 48% of the votes cast. Dr Alfonso Barrantes Lingán, candidate of the Izquierda Unida (IU), received over 23% of the votes, and Dr Luis Bedoya Reyes, candidate of the Convergencia Democrática, received over 12% of the votes. It was thought unlikely that a second round of voting would be held, as García Pérez was expected to obtain over 50% of the votes, the majority required for a clear victory.

CAMEROON

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Cameroon lies on the west coast of Africa, with Nigeria to the west, Chad and the Central African Republic to the east, and the Congo, Equatorial Guinea and Gabon to the south. The climate is hot and humid in the south and west, with average temperatures of 26°C (80°F). The north is drier, with more extreme temperatures. The official languages are French and English, and many local languages are also spoken. Approximately one-half of all Cameroonians follow traditional religious beliefs. About 35% are Christians, and about 20%, mostly in the north, are Muslims. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) consists of a vertical tricolour of green, red and yellow, with a five-pointed gold star in the centre of the red stripe. The capital is Yaoundé.

Recent History

In 1884 a German protectorate was established in Cameroon (Kamerun). In 1916, during the First World War, the German administration was overthrown by invading British and French forces. Under an agreement made between the occupying powers in 1919, Cameroon was divided into two zones: a French-ruled area, in the east and south, and a smaller British area in the west. In 1922 both zones became subject to mandates of the League of Nations, with France and the United Kingdom as the administering powers. In 1946 the zones were transformed into UN Trust Territories, with British and French rule continuing in their respective areas.

French Cameroons became an autonomous state, within the French Community, in 1957. Under the leadership of Ahmadou Ahidjo, a northerner who became Prime Minister in 1958, the territory became independent, as the Republic of Cameroon, on 1 January 1960. The first election for the country's National Assembly, held in April 1960, was won by Ahidjo's party, the Union camerounaise. In May the new Assembly elected Ahidjo to be the country's first President.

British Cameroons, comprising a northern and a southern region, was attached to neighbouring Nigeria, for administrative purposes, prior to Nigeria's independence in October 1960. Plebiscites were held, under UN auspices, in the two regions of British Cameroons in February 1961. The northern area voted to merge with Nigeria (becoming the province of Sardauna), while the south voted for union with the Republic of Cameroon, which took place on 1 October 1961.

The enlarged country was named the Federal Republic of Cameroon, with French and English as joint official languages. It comprised two states: the former French zone became East Cameroon, while the ex-British portion became West Cameroon. John Foncha, Prime Minister of West Cameroon and leader of the Kamerun National Democratic Party, became Vice-President of the Federal Republic. Under the continuing leadership of Ahidjo, who was re-elected President in May 1965, the two states became increasingly integrated, despite Cameroon's ethnic and cultural diversity. In September 1966 a one-party regime was established when the two governing parties and several opposition groups combined to form a single party, the Union nationale camerounaise (UNC). The party has grown to embrace almost all the country's political, cultural, professional and social organizations. The only significant opposition party, the extreme left-wing Union des populations de Cameroun (UPC), was finally crushed in 1971, although the leaders continued activities in exile in Paris. Meanwhile, President Ahidjo was re-elected in March 1970, when Solomon Muna (who had replaced Foncha as Prime Minister of West Cameroon in 1968) became Vice-President.

In June 1972, after approval by referendum of a new Constitution, the federal system was ended and the country became the United Republic of Cameroon. The office of Vice-President was abolished. A fully centralized political and administrative system was quickly introduced, and in May 1973 a new National Assembly was elected for a five-year term. After the re-election of Ahidjo as President in April 1975, the Constitution was revised and a Prime Minister, Paul Biya, appointed in June. Despite opposition from anglophone intellectuals who desired a return to the federal system of government, Ahidjo was unanimously re-elected for a fifth five-year term of office in April 1980.

President Ahidjo announced his resignation in November 1982 and named Paul Biya, the Prime Minister, as his successor. No official reasons for the resignation were given. The new President, a bilingual southerner, was expected to continue the policies of national unity and non-alignment which characterized Ahidjo's rule. Bello Bouba Maigari, a northerner, was appointed Prime Minister. Ahidjo retained the presidency of the UNC and his political influence continued. In January 1983 three members of the National Assembly, including the Vice-President, were expelled from the party.

In Cabinet reshuffles in April and June 1983, Biya introduced more technocrats into Government and gradually removed supporters of the former President. On 22 August 1983 Biya announced the discovery of a plot to overthrow his Government, and simultaneously dismissed the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Armed Forces. On 27 August former President Ahidjo resigned as President of the UNC and strongly criticized the regime of President Biya, accusing him of running a police state. In September Biya was elected President of the ruling party. An amendment to the Constitution, approved in December 1983, permitted candidates who were independent of the UNC to stand for the office of President. Presidential elections took place in January 1984, and Biya was re-elected with 99.98% of the vote. In a subsequent Cabinet reshuffle, the post of Prime Minister was abolished, and it was announced that the country's name was to change from the United Republic of Cameroon to the Republic of Cameroon.

In February 1984 Ahidjo (who was now in exile in France) and two of his close military advisers were tried for their alleged part in the coup plot of August 1983; death sentences were passed on all three men but commuted to life imprisonment two weeks later. On 6 April 1984, rebel elements in the presidential guard attempted to seize power and overthrow the Biya government. After three days of heavy fighting, in which hundreds were reported to have been killed, the rebellion was crushed by forces loyal to the President. The presidential guard was subsequently disbanded and reorganized, and martial law imposed in the Yaoundé area. Trials of those implicated in the coup were held in May, resulting in at least 43 executions. Following extensive changes within the military hierarchy, the UNC central committee and the leadership of state-controlled companies, in which supporters of the former President were dismissed, Biya reshuffled his government in July and introduced tighter press censorship.

Cameroon withdrew from OCAM in July 1973, and negotiated a revision of its co-operation agreements with France in 1974. The independent foreign policy pursued under President Ahidjo has been continued by his successor. The continuing close relationship with France was confirmed by President Biya's visit to Paris in February 1983, and President Mitterrand's return visit to Cameroon in the following June.

Government

Under the 1972 Constitution, executive power is vested in the President, as Head of State, while legislative power is held by the unicameral National Assembly, with 120 members. Both the President and the Assembly are elected for five years by universal adult suffrage. The number of deputies to the National Assembly is to increase to 150 to take account of the increase in population. The Cabinet is appointed by the President. Local administration is based on 10 provinces, each with a Governor who is appointed by the President.

Defence

In July 1984 Cameroon had an army of 6,600 and there were 5,000 men in paramilitary forces. The navy numbered 350 and the air force also had 350 men. France has a bilateral defence agreement with Cameroon. The defence budget for 1984/85 was 45,840m. francs CFA.

Economic Affairs

Cameroon has one of the highest levels of income per head in tropical Africa, although the basis of its economy is still essentially agriculture, despite the increasing role of petroleum. In 1982, according to World Bank estimates, Cameroon's GNP per head was US $890 (at average 1980–82 prices), having increased by 2.6% annually, in real terms, since 1960. The achievement of self-sufficiency in food is one of the priorities of the fifth Five-Year Plan, launched in 1981, although this target has virtually been met. Agriculture is well-diversified, and the main commercial products are cocoa (of which Cameroon is the world's fourth or fifth largest producer), coffee, bananas, cotton, palm oil and cane sugar. Agricultural production grew by almost 4% annually in 1961–80, and during that period accounted for between 70% and 75% of total export trade. The agricultural sector contributes about 25% of GDP and employs approximately 70% of the working population. In addition, Cameroon possesses considerable livestock and forestry resources. Forests cover about one-third of the total land area, and in 1983 the exploitable areas totalled 17,400,000 ha.

Output in virtually all agricultural sectors declined in 1981/82 and 1982/83, owing to persistent drought. The grain-growing northern regions were particularly affected, and the cereal shortfall in 1982/83 was estimated at 75,000 tons. Production of cocoa beans fell from 120,102 tons in 1981/82 to an estimated 106,000 tons the following year, but was forecast to improve in 1983/84. Cameroon's production of coffee fell from from 112,228 tons in 1980/81 to 104,548 tons in 1981/82. However, output rose to 148,000 tons in 1982/83, due to an increase in robusta production. Cotton production has increased since 1981/82, due to expansion of the area under cultivation; output of seed cotton totalled 72,368 tons in 1982/83, and was forecast to rise to 90,000 tons the following year. Production of sawlogs was 1,800,000 tons in 1981/82, but further development of Cameroon's forests depends on the creation of an adequate transport infrastructure.

The diversity of agricultural products has given rise to agro-industries, including a maize complex, sugar processing plants, tobacco factories, a paper and wood-pulp plant, and cotton spinning and weaving mills. The fifth Five-Year Plan (1981–86) allocated 377,200m. francs CFA for the development of the industrial sector, including mining and energy. Hydroelectricity provides around 95% of the country's power generation: the main installation is at Edéa, and work is under way to expand capacity at Song-Loulou to 288 MW by 1985.

Petroleum was discovered off Rio del Rey in 1973, and Cameroon's first oil exports were shipped in 1978. Output of crude petroleum increased steadily, from 800,000 metric tons in 1978 to 6.5m. metric tons in 1983/84. Production in 1985 was expected to reach 7.5m. metric tons and remain at that level until 1990. Further offshore oilfields were discovered near the Nigerian border, in the Wouri estuary and off Kribi in 1979/80. The capacity of the petroleum refinery, opened at Limbe (formerly Victoria) in 1980, is currently being doubled to 3m. tons. Plans for a liquefied natural gas plant at Kribi were in abeyance in 1984, following more modest revised estimates of natural gas resources in these areas. Export earnings from petroleum are not included in official trade accounts, but income from this sector is thought to have contributed more than one-half of current budget revenue in 1983. IMF estimates put Cameroon's oil export revenue in 1983/84 at US $1,300m. In 1982 the state oil corporation, Société Nationale des Hydrocarbures, obtained a 20% stake in all the petroleum producing companies. Bauxite deposits, estimated at 1,000m. tons, have been discovered at Minim-Martap, and are to be exploited by ALUCAM, the aluminium concern which at present uses imported bauxite from Guinea. Iron ore deposits near Kribi could also be developed in the near future.

In 1983/84 Cameroon's GDP was 3,060,000m. francs CFA, and was expected to rise to 3,645,000m. francs CFA in 1984/85, sustaining the real growth rate of 6.5%. Cameroon's trade deficit increased from 14,900m. francs CFA in 1979/80 to 95,500m. francs CFA in 1981/82, largely as a result of the fall in prices of its main commodities on the international market and the stagnation of the quantities exported. Revised figures, however, taking oil revenue into account for the first time, showed a surplus of 78,338m. francs CFA in 1981/82, rising to 128,231m. the following year. Inflation has become an increasingly severe problem in Cameroon: prices rose by 13.6% between October 1982 and October 1983, and by April 1984 inflation was estimated to have reached 20%, attributable to the government's expansionary monetary policy, increased food prices due to drought, and imported inflation. External debt was estimated at about US $2,000m. in 1980/81. The debt service ratio is not expected to rise above 10% of annual export earnings in 1981–86, making it one of the lowest in black Africa. The aims of the fifth Five-Year Plan included increased production of agricultural exports and intensified research and exploitation of minerals and energy resources, with investments based on an estimated overall growth rate of 7% per year. An investment code implemented in June 1984 gave priority to job creation and industrial decentralization, and provided incentives and technical assistance for small and medium-sized firms.

Transport and Communications

There are road links between the former French Equatorial states and Nigeria. A bridge is being constructed over the River Chari, linking N'Djamena, the capital of neighbouring Chad, with Kousseri, while road links are planned with southern Chad. The main rail routes within Cameroon are between Douala and Yaoundé, and Yaoundé and Ngaoundéré. A major highway between Yaoundé and Douala was due for completion in 1984. International shipping lines call at Douala and Limbe (formerly Victoria). There are internal and international air services.

Social Welfare

The government and Christian missions maintain hospitals and medical centres, but there are no welfare services covering the whole population. In 1979 Cameroon had 22,800 hospital beds in 126 hospitals and health centres and 900 dispensaries. There were 509 physicians and about 3,000 nurses. A campaign aiming at 'Health for all by the year 2000' is being carried out, involving the training of medical staff for rural health centres.

Education

Education is provided by the government, missionary societies and private concerns. Education in state schools is free, and the government provides financial assistance for other schools; there is a bilingual primary school in each province, and most secondary schools are also bilingual. In 1976 adult illiteracy averaged 59.5% (males 45.4%; females 75.5%). In 1978 a programme of standardization of curricula was undertaken. In 1981 an estimated 79% of school-age children attended school overall, but only 32% attended in the northern region. The State University at Yaoundé, founded in 1962, has been decentralized, and consists of five regional campuses. Budgets in recent years have given high priority to education, with an allocation of 61,477m. francs CFA in 1984/85.

Tourism

Tourists are attracted by the cultural diversity of local customs, and by the national parks, game reserves and sandy beaches. The tourist trade is being expanded, and in 1983 there were 116,152 foreign visitors. In the course of the 1981–86 development plan, 20 new hotels are expected to be built, and more money is to be made available for the protection of animals in national parks.

RAILWAYS

There are 1,172 km of track, the West Line running from Douala to Nkongsamba (172 km) with a branch line leading south-west from Mbanga to Kumba (29 km), and the Transcameroon railway which runs from Douala to Ngaoundéré (930 km), with a branch line from Ngoumou to Mbalmayo (30 km). The section from Yaoundé to Ngaoundéré (622 km) was opened in 1974. An extension of its western branch is projected from Mbalmayo to Bangui, capital of the Central African Republic. Improvements to the line between Douala and Yaoundé were begun in 1974; those on the section between Yaoundé and Maloumé were completed in April 1978, and those between Douala and Edéa in 1981. Improvements to the section between Edéa and Eseka, which cut the 90 km line to 82 km, were completed in 1982. Construction of the final section, between Eseka and Maloumé, began in early 1983 and is scheduled for completion in 1986.

There are two sea ports at Kribi and Limbe/Tiko, a river port at Garoua, and an estuary port at Douala, the largest port and main outlet. It has 2,510 m of quays and a minimum depth of 5.8 m in the channels, 8.5 m at the quays. In 1983 the port of Douala handled 3,752,002 metric tons, over 95% of total sea-borne traffic. Extensions and modernizations to the port were completed in January 1980, and a storage zone for the use of land-locked central African countries has been constructed. Handling capacity increased to 7m. metric tons per year. Plans are under way to increase the annual capacity of the container terminal from 1.5m. tons to 2m. tons. Facilities for ship-repair have also been provided, and there is a logistic area for oil research facilities.

CANADA

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

Canada occupies the northern part of North America (excluding Alaska and Greenland) and is the second largest country in the world. It extends from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific. Except for the boundary with Alaska in the north-west, Canada's frontier with the USA follows the upper St Lawrence Seaway and the Great Lakes, continuing west along latitude 49°N. The climate is an extreme one, particularly inland. Winter temperatures drop well below freezing but summers are generally warm. Rainfall varies from moderate to light and there are heavy falls of snow. The two official languages are English and French, the mother tongues of 61.3% and 25.7%, respectively, at the general census in 1981. More than 98% of Canadians can speak English or French. About 46% of the population are Roman Catholics. The main Protestant churches are the United Church of Canada and the Anglican Church of Canada, but most Christian denominations are represented. The national flag (proportions 2 by 1) consists of a red maple leaf on a white field, flanked by red panels. The capital is Ottawa.

Recent History

The Liberals, led by Pierre Trudeau, were returned to office at general elections in 1968, 1972, 1974, and again in 1980 after a short-lived minority Progressive Conservative administration. Foreign relations altered significantly under the Liberals, with less emphasis on traditional links with Western Europe and the USA, and a fostering of relations with the Far East, Africa and Latin America.

In 1975 Canada began to experience the effects of international economic recession. This led to a steady erosion of the Government's popularity, which finally resulted in the Liberals' defeat at general elections held in May 1979, although the Progressive Conservative administration, led by Joe Clark, lacked an overall majority. In November, Trudeau announced that he was resigning as Liberal leader, but in the following month the Government was defeated on its budget proposals. Trudeau postponed his retirement, and at general elections in February 1980 the Liberals were returned with a strong majority. Popular support for the new Government, however, fell rapidly with the persistence of adverse economic conditions, while the Progressive Conservatives gained substantially in popularity under the leadership of Brian Mulroney, a Quebec labour lawyer and businessman with no previous political experience, who replaced Clark in June 1983.

With the Liberals' popular standing at a post-war low, Trudeau, who had earlier indicated that he would vacate the party leadership before the general elections due in 1985, resigned in June 1984 and was succeeded as Liberal leader and Prime Minister by John Turner, a former Minister of Finance who had left active politics in 1975 following a disagreement with Trudeau. Nine days after taking office, Turner called general elections for September. The Liberals entered the pre-election period with revived popular support, but criticism of Turner's exercise of political patronage and of his general conduct of the election campaign saw the Liberals' following recede. Mulroney, an able bilingual public speaker, led the Progressive Conservatives to the largest electoral majority in Canadian history, winning massive parliamentary support even in the traditionally Liberal stronghold of Quebec.

Shortly after taking office, Prime Minister Mulroney visited US President Reagan, in a move to re-establish Canada's traditional 'special relationship' with the USA, which had operated until the Trudeau period. It is expected that Canada will now broadly support US foreign policy, particularly in Latin America, and increase its commitment to NATO defence. A contentious issue, however, is Canada's wish to secure effective US government control of the emission of gases from industrial plants, which move northwards into Canada to produce environmentally destructive 'acid rain'. Domestically, the Progressive Conservatives have promised moves to stimulate foreign investment, an overhaul of the tax system, and action to reduce the budget deficit.

Politically, separatism in Quebec, where four-fifths of the population speak French as a first language and which maintains its own cultural identity, has remained a sensitive issue. At provincial elections in 1976 the separatist Parti Québécois, led by René Lévesque, defeated the incumbent Liberals, and in 1977 made French the official language of education, business and government in Quebec. Certain sections of this act have since been declared 'inoperable' and unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Canada.

During 1977 Lévesque's Government reiterated its aim of sovereignty for Quebec; however in 1978 Lévesque denied that unilateral separation was contemplated and stated that a 'sovereignty-association', with a monetary and customs union, would be sought. At a Quebec provincial referendum held in May 1980, Lévesque's plan was rejected by an electoral margin of 59.5% to 40.5%. The Parti Québécois was re-elected at provincial general elections held in April 1981, but has lost seats in subsequent by-elections. Lévesque, who had announced that the next provincial general elections would be fought on the sovereignty question, precipitated a party split and cabinet resignations in November 1984 when he declared that Quebec's economic problems should instead form the main election issue.

Constitutional reform has been a major political issue. Between 1978 and 1980, a series of proposals was made by federal and provincial governments and various advisory bodies for the patriation of the Constitution, whereby the UK Parliament would transfer to Canada authority over all matters contained in British statutes relating to Canada, opening the way for the reform of central institutions and the redistribution of legislative powers between Parliament and the Provincial Legislatures.

Trudeau and the Provincial Premiers were unable to agree on reform proposals, mainly because of the wish of several of the provinces to retain full control of their natural resources. In October 1980 the Federal Government announced that it would proceed unilaterally with a constitutional reform plan incorporating patriation and a charter of rights which would be binding on all provinces. Eight of the 10 provinces challenged the plan in the Supreme Court of Canada, which ruled in September 1981 that, while the Federal Government was acting within its powers, further efforts should be made to obtain the provinces' agreement. Renewed talks between Trudeau and the provincial leaders finally resulted in all the provinces except Quebec accepting compromise proposals which included a revised charter of rights and a new formula for constitutional amendments made after patriation, whereby such amendments would require the support of at least seven provinces representing more than 50% of the population. In December the plan was overwhelmingly approved by the Federal Parliament. It was adopted by the UK Parliament in March 1982 and formally took effect in April as the Constitution Act 1982. Quebec, however, has maintained its opposition to the reform and its legislature has claimed the right to veto constitutional provisions, although this has been disallowed by the Supreme Court of Canada. The federal Progressive Conservative Government, however, stated in late 1984 that it would make new efforts to bring Quebec into the constitutional accord.

The Northwest Territories, which form one-third of Canada's land mass but contain a population of only 49,000 (including 16,000 Inuit and 9,000 Indians) may eventually secure a new constitutional status. In November 1982 the Federal Government agreed in principle to implement the decision of a territorial referendum held in April, in which 56% of the voters approved a division of the NWT into two parts. It was expected that a greater degree of self-government would also be granted to the new territories and to the Yukon.

Government

Canada is a federal parliamentary state. Under the Constitution Act 1982, executive power is vested in the British monarch, as Head of State, and exercisable by her representative, the Governor-General, whom she appoints on the advice of the Canadian Prime Minister. The Federal Parliament comprises the Head of State, a nominated Senate (104 members, appointed on a regional basis) and a House of Commons (282 members elected by universal adult suffrage for single-member constituencies). A Parliament may last no longer than five years. The Governor-General appoints the Prime Minister and, on the latter's recommendation, other ministers to form the Cabinet. The Prime Minister should have the confidence of the House of Commons, to which the Cabinet is responsible. Canada comprises 10 provinces (each with a lieutenant-governor and a legislature, which may last no longer than five years, from which a premier is chosen), and two territories constituted by Act of Parliament.

Defence

Canada co-operates with the USA in the defence of North America and is a member of NATO. In July 1984 the armed forces numbered 82,858: army 13,000, navy 5,500, air force 15,300 and 49,000 not identified by service. Defence expenditure for 1984/85 was estimated in February 1984 at C $8,782m.

Economic Affairs

The Canadian economy is closely linked with that of the USA, which accounts for about 70% of total trade in merchandise, although efforts are being made to develop alternative markets, notably in Japan, the People's Republic of China and the EEC. Many sectors of Canadian industry rely heavily on foreign investment. Foreign control of Canadian corporations reached its peak in the early 1970s; since then, mainly as a result of government and private-sector acquisitions, such control has declined. The share of assets held by foreign-controlled corporations in the non-financial (mainly petroleum) industries increased by 1.8% to 25.5% in 1981. Corporations classified as US-controlled hold a dominant position, accounting for 73.9% of these assets in 1981. In October 1980 the Government declared its aim of reducing the foreign-owned proportion to 50% by 1990. By early 1982 the reversal of foreign investment funds caused by this policy was exerting serious pressure on the balance of payments and on the Canadian dollar exchange rate, and in June the Government eased certain restrictions on foreign investors. The Progressive Conservative Government, elected in September 1984, has relaxed some controls on foreign ownership of Canadian corporations and energy enterprises.

Canada, one of the world's leading industrial countries, is also a major world exporter of agricultural products and, in terms of value, the world's leading fish and seafood exporter. The main exports in 1983 were motor vehicles and parts, natural gas, wheat, newsprint paper, wood pulp, softwood lumber and crude petroleum. Canada is the world's largest producer of zinc and the second largest of nickel, asbestos and potash. The country is also rich in many other minerals, including gold, silver, aluminium, iron, copper, uranium, cobalt, elemental sulphur and lead. There are considerable petroleum and natural gas resources in Alberta, off the Atlantic coast and in the Canadian Arctic islands, although the development and profitability of this industry has been adversely affected by the fall in world oil prices since 1981/82. In July 1980 construction was authorized of the initial section of the Alaska Highway Gas Pipeline, which will transport US gas from Alaska to join existing pipelines in British Columbia and Alberta for distribution in the USA and, at a later date, in Canada. The project, costing an estimated C $23,000m., is due for completion in 1987.

In 1975 Canada began to be affected by the international slump, and inflationary pressures have contributed to its economic problems. The Canadian dollar has depreciated sharply in succeeding years; high interest rates and tight monetary controls have been slow to take effect. Inflation reached 12.8% in 1981 before easing to 10.8% in 1982 and responding finally to anti-inflation measures, including high interest rates, by falling to 5.8% in 1983 and to less than 4% in late 1984. Unemployment, however, has remained a serious problem, rising from 7.6% in 1981 to 11% in 1982, 11.9% in 1983 and easing only marginally to 11.2% in late 1984. Under heavy pressure to relieve unemployment, the Government moved in October 1982 to divert C $1,100m. from energy, defence and foreign aid allocations to finance job creation programmes. The overall budget deficit for 1983/84 was C $32,024m. In February 1984 the Liberal Government projected a 1984/85 deficit of almost C $30,875m., rising to C $37,100m. for 1985/86. In October the new Progressive Conservative Government announced fiscal measures aimed at reducing this figure to C $34,900m., equivalent to more than 7% of GNP. Further action, possibly including taxation increases, was promised in a full budget in the spring of 1985.

Given continued strength in the US economy, to which Canada's prosperity is closely linked, 1985 growth in GNP is expected to achieve 3%, after attaining 4.5% in 1984. Unemployment, however, is likely to persist as a serious problem, and could worsen in the wake of any further cuts in public spending.

Transport and Communications

Owing to the size of the country, Canada's economy is particularly dependent upon an efficient system of transport and communications. The St Lawrence Seaway allows ocean-going ships to reach the Great Lakes. There are nearly 85,000 km (53,000 miles) of railway track, and Canada's rail and canal system is being increasingly supplemented by roads, air services and pipelines. The Trans-Canada Highway is one of the major features of a network of 392,000 km (243,600 miles) of roads and highways. In 1977 Canada extended its coastal jurisdiction to 370 km (200 nautical miles).

Social Welfare

Over 40% of the 1984/85 federal budget, announced in February 1984, was allocated to health and social welfare. The Federal Government administers family allowances, unemployment insurance and pensions. Other services are provided by the provinces. A federal medical care insurance programme covers all Canadians against medical expenses, and a federal-provincial hospital insurance programme covers over 99% of the insurable population.

Education

Education is a provincial matter, and the period of compulsory education varies. French-speaking students are entitled by law, in some provinces, to instruction in French. Primary education is from the age of five or six years to 13–14, followed by three to five years at secondary or high school. In 1981 an estimated 96% of children aged six to 11 attended primary schools, while 85% of those aged 12 to 17 were enrolled at secondary schools. There are 66 universities and 196 other institutions of higher education.

Tourism

Canada offers a wide range of outdoor tourist attractions. Its scenic, cultural and ethnic diversity add to its travel appeal, as do the developing attractions of its metropolitan centres. Most visitors are from the USA (32.5m. in 1983). Tourist spending in 1983 amounted to C $3,182m.

Public Holidays

1985: 20 May (for Victoria Day), 1 July (Canada Day), 2 September (Labour Day), 14 October (Thanksgiving), 11 November (Remembrance Day), 25 December (Christmas Day), 26 December (Boxing Day).

1986: 1 January (New Year), 28 March (Good Friday), 31 March (Easter Monday).

Weights and Measures

The imperial system is in general use with the exception of the 2,000 lb American ton; the metric system is in course of implementation. A government agency, Metric Commission Canada, is co-ordinating the metrication programme.

Currency and Exchange Rates

100 cents = 1 Canadian dollar (C $).

Exchange rates (31 December 1984):
£1 sterling = C $1.531;
US $1 = C $1.320.

The Constitution

Constitutional development has been based mainly upon five important acts of the British Parliament: the Quebec Act of 1774, the Constitutional Act of 1791, the Act of Union of 1840, the British North America Act of 1867, and the Canada Act of 1982. The British North America Act 1867 provided that the Constitution of the Dominion should be 'similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom'; that the executive authority be vested in the Sovereign, and carried on in her name by a Governor-General and Privy Council; and that legislative power be exercised by a Parliament of two Houses, the Senate and the House of Commons. The enactment of the Canada Act of 1982 was the final act of the United Kingdom Parliament in Canadian constitutional development. The Act gave to Canada the power to amend the Constitution according to procedures determined by the Constitution Act 1982, which was proclaimed in force by the Queen on 17 April 1982. The Constitution Act 1982 added to the Canadian Constitution a Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and provisions which recognize the nation's multicultural heritage, affirm the existing rights of native peoples, confirm the principle of equalization of benefits among the provinces and strengthen provincial ownership of natural resources.

THE GOVERNMENT

The national government works itself out through three main agencies. There is Parliament (consisting of the Sovereign as represented by the Governor-General, the Senate and the House of Commons) which makes the laws; the Executive (the Cabinet or Ministry) which applies the laws; and the Judiciary which interprets the laws.

Particular features similar to the British system of government are the close relation which exists between the Executive and Legislative branches, and the doctrine of cabinet responsibility which has become crystallized in the course of time. The Prime Minister is appointed by the Governor-General and is habitually the leader of the political party commanding the confidence of the House of Commons. He chooses the members of his Cabinet from members of his party in Parliament, principally from those in the House of Commons. Each Minister or member of the Cabinet is usually responsible for the administration of a department, although there may be Ministers without portfolio whose experience and counsel are drawn upon to strengthen the Cabinet, but who are not at the head of departments. Each Minister of a department is responsible to Parliament for that department, and the Cabinet as a whole is responsible before Parliament for government policy and administration generally.

Meetings of the Cabinet are presided over by the Prime Minister. From the Cabinet signed orders and recommendations go to the Governor-General for his approval, and the Crown acts only on the advice of its responsible Ministers. The Cabinet takes the responsibility for its advice being in accordance with the support of Parliament and is held strictly accountable.

THE FEDERAL PARLIAMENT

Parliament must meet at least once a year, so that twelve months do not elapse between the last meeting in one session and the first meeting in the next. The duration of Parliament may not be longer than five years from the date of election of a House of Commons. Senators (a maximum of 104 in number) are appointed until age 75 by the Governor-General in Council. They must be at least 30 years of age, residents of the province they represent and in possession of C $4,000 of real property over and above their liabilities. Members of the House of Commons are elected by universal adult suffrage for the duration of a Parliament.

Under the Constitution, the Federal Parliament has exclusive legislative authority in all matters relating to public debt and property; regulation of trade and commerce; raising of money by any mode of taxation; borrowing of money on the public credit; postal service, census and statistics; militia, military and naval service and defence; fixing and providing for salaries and allowances of the officers of the government; beacons, buoys and lighthouses; navigation and shipping; quarantine and the establishment and maintenance of marine hospitals; sea-coast and inland fisheries; ferries on an international or interprovincial frontier; currency and coinage; banking, incorporation of banks, and issue of paper money; savings banks; weights and measures; bills of exchange and promissory notes; interest; legal tender; bankruptcy and insolvency; patents of invention and discovery; copyrights; Indians and lands reserved for Indians; naturalization and aliens; marriage and divorce; the criminal law, except the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction but including the procedure in criminal matters; the establishment, maintenance and management of penitentiaries; such classes of subjects as are expressly excepted in the enumeration of the classes of subjects exclusively assigned to the Legislatures of the provinces by the Act. Judicial interpretation and later amendment have, in certain cases, modified or clearly defined the respective powers of the Federal and Provincial Governments.

Both the Parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces may legislate with respect to agriculture and immigration, but provincial legislation shall have effect in and for the provinces as long and as far only as it is not repugnant to any Act of Parliament. Both Parliament and the provincial legislatures may legislate with respect to old age pensions and supplementary benefits, but no federal law shall affect the operation of any present or future law of a province in relation to these matters.

PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT

In each of the ten provinces the Sovereign is represented by a Lieutenant-Governor, appointed by the Governor-General in Council, and acting on the advice of the Ministry or Executive Council, which is responsible to the Legislature and resigns office when it ceases to enjoy the confidence of that body. The Legislatures are unicameral, consisting of an elected Legislative Assembly and the Lieutenant-Governor. The duration of a Legislature may not exceed five years from the date of the election of its members.

The Legislature in each province may exclusively make laws in relation to: amendment of the constitution of the province, except as regards the Lieutenant-Governor; direct taxation within the province; borrowing of money on the credit of the province; establishment and tenure of provincial offices and appointment and payment of provincial officers; the management and sale of public lands belonging to the province and of the timber and wood thereon; the establishment, maintenance and management of public and reformatory prisons in and for the province; the establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities and charitable institutions in and for the province other than marine hospitals; municipal institutions in the province; shop, saloon, tavern, auctioneer and other licences issued for the raising of provincial or municipal revenue; local works and undertakings other than interprovincial or international lines of ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, etc., or works which, though wholly situtated within the province are declared by the Federal Parliament to be for the general advantage either of Canada or two or more provinces; the incorporation of companies with provincial objects; the solemnization of marriage in the province; property and civil rights in the province; the administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts both in civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in these courts; the imposition of punishment by fine, penalty or imprisonment for enforcing any law of the province relating to any of the aforesaid subjects; generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province. Further, provincial Legislatures may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject to the protection of religious minorities; and to non-renewable natural resources, forestry resources and electrical energy, including their export from one province to another, and to the right to impose any mode or system of taxation thereon, subject in both cases to such laws not being discriminatory.

Under the Constitution Act, the municipalities are the creations of the provincial governments. Their bases of organization and the extent of their authority vary in different provinces, but almost everywhere they have very considerable powers of local self-government.

The Press

The vastness of the country hampers distribution and the establishment of a strong national press, so the daily press in Canada is essentially local in coverage, influence and distribution. Through the use of satellite transmission, a national edition of the Toronto Globe and Mail, established in 1981, is now available coast to coast.

The number of independently-owned daily newspapers remains limited in a country where chain ownership is predominant: over 50% of daily newspaper circulation is represented by three major groups: Thomson Newspapers Ltd (20% of daily newspaper circulation), Southam Inc (27.5%) and Sterling Newspapers. There are several smaller groups, but the number of independently-owned dailies remains limited, representing 18% of total daily newspaper circulation.

In September 1980 the Liberal government appointed a royal commission to investigate the effects of concentration of ownership in the newspaper industry. In August 1981 the commission reported that the existing concentration constituted a threat to press freedom, and recommended that some groups should be compelled to sell some of their newspaper interests in areas where there was extreme ownership concentration. While government action on the report had still to be finalized when the Liberals were defeated in the election of September 1984, it was expected that the Progressive Conservative government would continue to restrict cross-media ownership of newspapers, radio and television, and to prohibit non-media companies from owning daily newspapers.

In late 1984 there were 111 daily newspapers with a combined circulation of over 5.5m., representing three-quarters of the country's households.

In 1984 about 1,100 weekly and twice-weekly community newspapers reached an estimated 5.2m. people, mainly in the more remote areas of the country. A significant feature of the Canadian press is the number of newspapers catering for ethnic groups: there are over 80 of these daily and weekly publications appearing in over 20 languages.

There are numerous periodicals for business, trade, professional, recreational and special interest readership, although periodical publishing, particularly, suffers from substantial competition from publications originating in the USA. Among periodicals, the only one which can claim to be national in its readership and coverage is Maclean's Canada's Weekly Newsmagazine.

Radio and Television

The 1968 Broadcasting Act set out the broadcasting policy of Canada, established the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) as the national, publicly owned, broadcasting service and created the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) as the agency regulating radio, television and cable television. The CBC is financed mainly by public funds supplemented by revenue from television advertising. Broadcasters are responsible for content, but freedom of expression is guaranteed; programming is to use predominantly Canadian creative and other resources; and Canadians are entitled to broadcasting services in English and French.

Broadcasting stations make radio and television service available to 98% of the population: 75% of Canadian homes subscribe to cable television service and existing circuits make this service, which is provided by 470 cable television systems, immediately available to 80% of Canadian homes. Most television programming is in colour and 84% of homes have colour TV sets.

Many privately-owned television and radio stations have affiliation agreements with the CBC and help to distribute the national services. The major private networks are CTV, TVA (which serves the province of Quebec) and Global (serving the province of Ontario), as well as the educational networks.

Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC): Ottawa K1A 0N2; telex 053-4253; f. 1968; regional offices in Montreal, Halifax, Winnipeg and Vancouver; Chair. André Bureau; Vice-Chair. John E. Lawrence (Telecommunications), Réal Therrien (Broadcasting).

RADIO

The CBC operates two AM networks, one in English and one in French, and FM stereo networks in English and French. In the north, the CBC's northern radio service provides both national network programming in English and French, and special local and short-wave programmes, some of which are broadcast in the languages of the Indian and Inuit peoples. In March 1984 there were 838 outlets for CBC radio (79 CBC-owned stations, 618 CBC-owned relay transmitters, 141 private affiliates and rebroadcasters). CBC radio service, which is virtually free of commercial advertising, is within reach of 99.3% of the population. Radio Canada International, the CBC's overseas short-wave service, has its headquarters in Montreal and its transmitters near Sackville, New Brunswick. It broadcasts daily in 11 languages and distributes recorded programmes free for use by broadcasters throughout the world.

TELEVISION

The CBC operates two television networks, one in English and one in French. Northern television does not yet have the capacity for local production but it supplements the national programmes it carries with English and French programmes from other regions of Canada and with service broadcasting and film documentaries in the Inuktitut language. As of March 1984, CBC television was carried on 899 outlets (30 CBC-owned stations, 606 CBC-owned rebroadcasters, 263 private affiliates and rebroadcasters). CBC television is available to over 97% of the population. CBC transmission methods include leased channels on the Canadian space satellite Anik. Anik 1 started operation in 1973 and was the world's first synchronous domestic communications satellite.

There are five educational services; TV Ontario in Ontario and Radio-Quebec in Quebec operate their own television stations and networks; the Access network in Alberta purchases time for educational cultural programming on the private TV stations of the province; Knowledge Network is involved in the distribution, development and co-ordination of educational television programming to British Columbia communities via Anik satellite and cable; and Saskmedia is involved in the production, acquisition and distributing of educationally-oriented media programming.

In March 1982 the CRTC licensed six companies to provide pay television services; two national and three regional services, together with one local multicultural pay TV service, which became available to cable subscribers in early 1983. Two of these companies, however, subsequently ceased operations. There are now single national English- and French-language services covering all of Canada. In April 1984 the CRTC licensed an all-music channel and an all-sports channel, which became available in September. Consideration is being given to a religious channel, a youth channel and a health channel.

Canadian Satellite Communications Ltd of Whitehorse, Yukon, was licensed in April 1981 to provide a package of television and FM radio signals via Anik satellite to remote and underserved Canadian communities. By March 1984 284 communities had availed themselves of this service.

BANKING

The first Canadian commercial bank was founded in 1817. A further 34 banks were established over the next 50 years, and following Confederation in 1867 the Bank Act of 1871 gave the Federal Government regulatory powers over banking operations throughout Canada.

The Bank Act of 1980 reorganized the banking structure by creating two categories of banking institution: 'Schedule A' banks, comprising the existing chartered banks; and 'Schedule B' banks, which are either subsidiaries of foreign banks (whose total Canadian assets cannot exceed 8% of those of the banking system in total), or Canadian-owned banks under private or semi-private ownership. The Act, which is subject to review at 10-year intervals to allow for changes in government policy and economic conditions, strictly limits the range of permitted operations outside the banking sphere, in order to curtail competition betweeen banks and commercial enterprises. In July 1984 there were 13 'Schedule A' banks (of which no individual shareholder may control more than 10%) and 59 'Schedule B' banks.

The Bank of Canada, established as the central bank in 1934 and controlled by the Federal Government, implements government monetary and credit policies through the commercial banks. It operates the banks' clearing system and also holds the banks' primary and secondary reserves. Direct regulatory inspections of the commercial banks are carried out by the Ministry of Finance, and a federal agency insures individual deposits up to a limit of C $60,000.

At the end of 1983, there were 7,076 commercial bank branches holding deposits totalling C $171,537m. The banks' combined assets totalled C $368,628m., of which 42.5% were represented by foreign currency holdings, reflecting the importance of international business in Canadian banking.

Trust and loan companies, which were originally formed to deal with mortgage finance and private customer loans, now play an important role in the banking system, offering individual customer current account facilities and providing access to money transfer services.

ROADS

Provincial governments are responsible for roads within their boundaries. The federal government is responsible for the construction of major roads in the Yukon and Northwest Territories and in National Parks. In 1982 there were 391,792 km of roads of which 41.9% were paved.

The Trans-Canada Highway extends from St John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, British Columbia.

INLAND WATERWAYS

The St Lawrence River and the Great Lakes provide Canada and the USA with a system of inland waterways extending from the Atlantic Ocean to the western end of Lake Superior, a distance of 3,769 km (2,342 miles). There is a 10.7-m (35-foot) navigation channel from Montreal to the sea and an 8.25-m (27-foot) channel from Montreal to Lake Erie. The St Lawrence Seaway, which was opened in 1959, was initiated partly to provide a deep waterway and partly to satisfy the demand for more electric power. Power development has been undertaken by the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and by New York State. The navigation facilities and conditions are within the jurisdiction of the federal governments of the USA and Canada.

CAPE VERDE

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Cape Verde is an archipelago of 10 islands and five islets in the North Atlantic Ocean, about 500 km (300 miles) west of Dakar, Senegal. The country lies in a semi-arid belt, with little rain and an average annual temperature of 24°C (76°F). The official language is Portuguese, of which the locally spoken form is Creole (Crioulo). Virtually all of the inhabitants profess Christianity, and 98% are Roman Catholics. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) has a vertical red stripe at the hoist, with horizontal stripes of yellow and green. The red stripe bears, in the upper hoist, a five-pointed black star and a clamshell enclosed by a wreath of palms. The capital is Cidade de Praia.

Recent History

The Cape Verde Islands were colonized by the Portuguese in the 15th century. From the 1950s liberation movements in Portugal's African colonies were campaigning for independence and, in this context, the archipelago was linked with the mainland territory of Portuguese Guinea (now Guinea-Bissau). At first, however, the Partido Africano da Independência do Guiné e Cabo Verde (PAIGC) made little progress in the islands, although regarding them as an integral part of its territory. The independence of Guinea-Bissau was recognized by Portugal in September 1974, but the PAIGC leadership in the Cape Verde Islands decided to pursue separate independence rather than enter into an immediate federation with Guinea-Bissau. In December 1974 a transitional government, comprising representatives of the Portuguese Government and the PAIGC, was formed; members of other political parties were excluded. A National People's Assembly was chosen on 30 June 1975 in the islands' first general election. Only the PAIGC contested the poll, and there was 92% support for the party's platform of ultimate union with Guinea-Bissau. Independence was granted on 5 July 1975, and Aristides Pereira, Secretary-General of the PAIGC, became Cape Verde's first President. The country's first Constitution was approved in September 1980.

Although Cape Verde and Guinea-Bissau remained constitutionally separate, the PAIGC supervised the activities of both states, but progress towards the ultimate goal of unification was slow. Moreover, the Cape Verde Government disapproved of the November 1980 coup in Guinea-Bissau, and in January 1981 the Cape Verde wing of the PAIGC was renamed the Partido Africano da Independência de Cabo Verde (PAICV). In February President Pereira was re-elected unanimously by the National Assembly, and all articles concerning ultimate union with Guinea-Bissau were removed from the constitution. Reconciliation talks were held in June 1982, however, after the release of Luis Cabral, formerly the Head of State in Guinea-Bissau, and relations continued to improve during the summit meeting of Lusophone African states which was held in Praia in September. Diplomatic relations between the two countries were normalized in 1982.

Sixteen people were imprisoned in June 1982 for inciting riots (in August 1981) in protest against the proposed land reform bill, designed to expropriate absentee landlords and to transfer ownership of land to those who cultivate it.

Cape Verde professes a non-aligned stance in foreign affairs and maintains relations with virtually all the power blocs. Cape Verde's reputation for political independence has led to its being chosen as the venue for several important international conferences: for example, in 1982/83 the talks between Angola and South Africa over Namibia, and a conference of CILSS (the Sahelian grouping of states), were held in Cape Verde. The country also takes an active part in co-operation between the Lusophone African states.

Government

Under the 1980 constitution, legislative power is vested in the National People's Assembly, with 56 deputies elected by universal adult suffrage for five years. Executive power is held by the President, elected for five years by the Assembly. The President appoints and leads the Council of Ministers. The PAICV is the only political party permitted.

Defence

The Popular Revolutionary Armed Forces have been formed from ex-combatants in the liberation wars, and numbered 1,100 (army 1,000, navy 75, air force 25) in July 1984. There is also a police force and paramilitary People's Militia. Estimated defence expenditure in 1981 was US $3.5m. In 1980 the USSR supplied two torpedo boats as the nucleus of a navy.

Economic Affairs

Little was done under Portuguese rule to develop the natural resources of the islands, such as the fishing grounds and the large reserves of underground water, or to alleviate the effects of the recurrent droughts and severe soil erosion. However, the World Bank has estimated that Cape Verde's gross national product (GNP) per head increased, in real terms, at an average rate of 5.5% per year between 1973 and 1980: one of the highest growth rates in Africa. In 1982, according to World Bank estimates, GNP per head was US $350 (at average 1980–82 prices), a little above the average for low-income countries.

The agricultural subsistence economy of the islands, which normally employs about three-quarters of the working population (mainly on smallholdings), has suffered from a drought which was in its 16th consecutive year in 1984. The staple crops are maize, beans and sweet potatoes, and other crops normally grown include sugar cane, cassava, castor beans, bananas, coffee and groundnuts. However, substantial food imports (about 90% of requirements) are needed to combat the serious shortages, and there is extensive rural unemployment, partly remedied by government employment schemes in soil and water conservation and reafforestation projects. Cape Verde's first four-year development plan was announced in 1982. It envisaged investment of US $405m., all from outside sources, the main aims being to move towards self-sufficiency in food and to continue to combat desertification. In 1983 Cape Verde received aid worth $387,500 from the UN Development Programme to help to develop co-operatives and, thereby, to increase food production. The 1984 budget envisaged revenue of 1,630m. escudos and expenditure of 2,134.5m. escudos. Public expenditure was to rise by 16% to cover the public debt, inflation and increases in public sector salaries. The budget stressed the education and health sectors, whose departmental budgets were to be increased by 27% and 29% respectively. Emphasis was also to be laid on job-creation schemes: the budget set a target of 3,000 jobs to be created in 1984.

There are almost 1m. Cape Verdeans living outside the country, principally in the USA, the Netherlands, Portugal and Italy. Remittances that are sent home by workers abroad (covering 39% of the trade deficit in 1979) help to alleviate the economic problems, but foreign aid is indispensable. European and Arab countries, Japan, the USA, the UN and the African Development Fund have all assisted Cape Verde in recent years. Fishing forms a large part of the islands' development potential and accounted for 70% of export revenue in 1979. The most important fish exports are lobster and tuna. A cold-storage plant was opened at Mindelo in 1981, and the Government was to invest a total of US $45m. to develop a modern fishing industry.

There is little manufacturing activity except for a few small fish-processing and canning plants and clothing factories, which together employ 1,700 people and contribute only 5% of the country's GDP. About 95% of all goods consumed in Cape Verde are imported, with Portugal remaining the principal supplier. The Government hopes, however, to exploit the islands' resources of pozzolana, cement and salt, and to develop construction and packaging materials, soft drinks, pasta and tobacco industries.

Transport and Communications

There were 2,250 km (1,400 miles) of roads in 1981. There are airports on each island, the principal one being at Espargos, on Sal Island. The main port is at Mindelo, on São Vicente, where a shipyard became operational in 1983. In 1983 work started on a new telecommunications network, consisting of three automatic exchanges which will provide international telephone and telex links.

Social Welfare

Medical facilities are limited and there is a severe shortage of staff and buildings, although plans for a national health service are being implemented. In 1978 Cape Verde had 23 hospital establishments, with a total of 575 beds, and there were 51 physicians working in the country. Development plans include the construction of more than 300 small local health units.

Education

Compulsory education is divided into Instrução Primária (for children aged seven to 12 years, of whom 95% were reportedly at school in 1980) and Escola Preparatória (for children aged 12 to 14). From the age of 14, children may attend one of the three liceus, which provide a three-year general course or a two-year pre-university course. In 1982/83 there was also one industrial and commercial school and three teacher training units. In the same year about 50,000 pupils attended 436 primary schools.

Priority is being given to the construction of schools, teacher training and the reduction of the illiteracy rate. Of the population aged 14 and over, 63.1% were illiterate in 1970.

Tourism

The Government launched a tourist development scheme in 1980. A large hotel already exists at Santa Maria beach, on Sal Island, and another was being built in Praia. The islands of Santo Antão, São Tiago, Fogo and Brava offer a combination of mountain scenery and vast beaches.

Directory

The Constitution

The Constitution of the Republic of Cape Verde, the first since the country's independence in 1975, was approved on 7 September 1980. It defines Cape Verde as 'a sovereign, democratic, unitary, anti-colonialist and anti-imperialist republic'. The Head of State is the President of the Republic, who is elected by the National Assembly and has a mandate of five years, as do the Assembly deputies, elected by universal adult suffrage. The Prime Minister is nominated by the same Assembly, to which he is responsible. The President of the National Assembly may act as interim Head of State if necessary. He is not a member of the government.

The Constitution abolishes both the death sentence and life imprisonment. Citizens have equality of rights and duties, without sexual, social, intellectual, religious or philosophical distinction. This extends to all Cape Verde emigrants throughout the world. Citizens also have freedom of thought, expression, association, demonstration, religion, rights and duties and the right to health care, culture and education.

On 12 February 1981 all articles concerning plans for eventual union with Guinea-Bissau were revoked, and an amendment was inserted to provide for the creation of the Partido Africano da Indepêndencia de Cabo Verde (PAICV) to replace the Cape Verde section of the PAIGC (defined in the Constitution as 'the leading force of society').

THE CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Central African Republic is a land-locked country in the heart of equatorial Africa. It is bounded by Chad to the north, by Sudan to the east, by the Congo and Zaire to the south and by Cameroon to the west. The climate is tropical, with an average annual temperature of 26°C (79°F) and heavy rains in the south-western forest areas. The national language is Sango, but French is the official language. Many of the population hold animist beliefs, but about one-third are Christians. The national flag (proportions 5 by 3) has four horizontal stripes of blue, white, green and yellow, divided vertically by a central red stripe, with a five-pointed yellow star and crescent in the upper hoist. The capital is Bangui.

Recent History

The former territory of Ubangi-Shari (Oubangui-Chari), within French Equatorial Africa, became the Central African Republic (CAR) on achieving self-government in December 1958. Full independence was attained on 13 August 1960. The leading figure in the campaign for self-government was Barthélemy Boganda, founder of the Mouvement d'évolution sociale de l'Afrique noire (MESAN). Boganda became the country's first Prime Minister, but he was killed in an air crash in March 1959. He was succeeded by his nephew, David Dacko, who led the country to independence and in 1962 established a one-party state, with MESAN as the sole authorized party. President Dacko was overthrown on 31 December 1965 by a military coup which brought to power his cousin, Col (later Marshal) Jean-Bédel Bokassa, Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces.

In 1966 Col Bokassa formed a new government, rescinded the Constitution and dissolved the National Assembly. Bokassa, who became Life President in 1972 and Marshal of the Republic in 1974, forestalled several alleged coups and used stern measures to suppress opposition.

In 1976 the Council of Ministers was replaced by the Council for the Central African Revolution, and ex-President Dacko was named personal adviser to the President. In December 1976 the Republic was renamed the Central African Empire (CAE) and a new Constitution was instituted. Bokassa was proclaimed the first Emperor, and Dacko became his Personal Counsellor. The Imperial Constitution provided for the establishment of a National Assembly but no elections were held.

The elaborate preparations for Bokassa's coronation in December 1977 were estimated to have consumed about one-quarter of the country's income. In May 1978 Bokassa reshuffled the army leadership and strengthened its powers. In July he dismissed the Council of Ministers and appointed a new Council, headed by Henri Maidou, previously a Deputy Prime Minister. In January 1979 violent protests, led by students, were suppressed, reportedly with the help of Zairian troops. Following the alleged massacre of nearly 100 schoolchildren by Bokassa himself, the Emperor's ambassador in Paris, Sylvestre Bangui, resigned in protest, and in September he set up a government-in-exile, comprising four opposition groups. On 20 September, while Bokassa was in Libya, David Dacko deposed him in a bloodless coup, strongly backed by France, and resumed power as President. The country thus became a republic again, and Henri Maidou was appointed Vice-President.

The prime concern of President Dacko was to establish order and economic stability in the CAR, but his Government was not accepted without some opposition, particularly from students who objected to the continuation in office of CAE Ministers. In September Dacko gave way to demands for the dismissal of both Henri Maidou and the unpopular Prime Minister, Bernard Christian Ayandho. The new Council of Ministers was led by Jean-Pierre Lebouder, formerly Minister of Planning. Bokassa, now in exile, was condemned to death in absentia in December 1980.

In February 1981 a new constitution, providing for a multi-party system, was approved by referendum and promulgated by President Dacko. He won a presidential election in March and was sworn in for a six-year term in April. Following accusations by his opponents of electoral malpractice, rioting broke out and a state of siege was declared in Bangui. Political tension increased after a bomb attack on a Bangui cinema in July, in which three people died. The Mouvement centrafricain de libération nationale claimed responsibility and was subsequently banned. A state of siege was again declared, and the army was called in to maintain order. The Chief of Staff of the armed forces, Gen. André Kolingba, deposed President Dacko in a bloodless coup on 1 September, citing 'gross violations of democracy' as reasons for the military take-over, and suspending all political activity. Power was assumed by a 23-member Military Committee for National Recovery, and an all-military Council of Ministers was formed.

In March 1982 the exiled leader of the banned Mouvement pour la libération du peuple centrafricain (MLPC), Ange Patasse, returned to Bangui and was implicated in an unsuccessful coup attempt. Patasse, former Prime Minister under Bokassa and presidential candidate in the March 1981 election, sought asylum in the French embassy in Bangui, from where he was transported to exile in Togo. French support for Patasse strained the military regime's relations with France, but a visit by President Mitterrand to the CAR in October 1982 normalized relations. Some former Government ministers were also implicated in the coup attempt, and in August 1984 two of the accused ex-ministers were sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment.

Opposition to Gen. Kolingba's regime continued, despite the suspension of all political activity in September 1981. In August 1983 a clandestine opposition movement was formed, uniting the three main opposition parties. Gen. Kolingba's plans for the creation of a one-party state, with elections to a National Assembly to be held in 1985, were announced in 1982. Kolingba's government remained entirely military after an extensive reshuffle in January 1984. However, several civilians were appointed as high commissioners, to attend meetings of the Council of Ministers upon invitation.

Government

Since the coup of September 1981, all legislative and executive power rests with the Comité militaire pour le redressement national, with 24 members. The Council of Ministers consists entirely of army officers. For administrative purposes, the country is divided into 14 prefectures and 47 sub-prefectures. At community level there are eight communes de plein exercice, four communes de moyen exercice and 164 communes rurales.

Defence

In July 1984 the armed forces numbered about 2,300 men (army 2,000; air force 300), with a further 1,500 men in paramilitary forces. Military service is compulsory for adult males and for male and female civil servants. France maintains a garrison of 980 men at Bouar. Estimated defence expenditure in 1981 was US $35m.

Economic Affairs

Since independence, the CAR's economic growth has barely kept pace with the increase in the country's population. In 1982, according to estimates by the World Bank, the gross national product per head (at average 1980–82 prices) was US $310, having increased at an average rate of only 0.6% per year, in real terms, since 1960. The average annual growth of overall gross domestic product (GDP), measured in constant prices, was 1.9% between 1960 and 1970, slowing to 1.4% in 1970–82. The real growth of GDP in 1982 was estimated at 0.5%.

About 86% of the working population are engaged in agriculture, which accounted for 30% of GDP in 1980. The most important cash crops are cotton and coffee, but subsistence farming predominates. The main subsistence crops are millet, sorghum and cassava. Since independence, both the production and export of food crops have declined. Manufacturing is mainly small-scale and accounted for 11% of GDP in 1980, the main activities being in timber, tanning, textiles and brewing. In August 1984 the Government announced measures to encourage the development of small and medium-sized enterprises.

Production of cotton declined, following a record harvest of 60,000 tons (unginned) in 1971, to only 17,242 tons in 1981. Output increased to 26,000 tons in 1982/83, and to 33,500 tons in 1983/84, owing mainly to an increase in the area planted and the restructuring of the national agricultural development corporation (SOCADA) as part of the Government's cotton development programme, launched in 1983. Coffee production was 18,000 tons in 1982/83, but widespread drought affected the 1983/84 crop, and output fell to 10,000 tons. Forests, containing more than 60 species of valuable trees, cover 5.5% of land area, and total exploitable potential is estimated to be 87.3 million cu m per year. Problems of transport and organization have hampered removals, but the proposed Bangui–Yaoundé railway and improvements to river navigation should increase efficiency.

Diamonds are found in alluvial deposits, mainly in the west of the country, and were the CAR's principal source of export earnings from the mid-1960s until 1973. The contribution of diamonds to total export revenue fell from 53% in 1968 to 17% in 1976, after which the Government took steps to promote investment in the industry. Revenue then steadily increased, and reached 50% of exports in 1979, falling to 30% in 1981. Production in 1983 was 295,000 carats, compared with a peak of 609,000 carats in 1968. The decline in export revenue is largely due to widespread evasion of export duties, with possibly 60% of total diamond production being smuggled out of the country. A feasibility study for a state uranium mining company, with French and Swiss participation, was begun in 1977; reserves are estimated at approximately 15,000 tons of metal at Bakouma, with a potential capacity to yield 1,000 tons per year. The possibility of petroleum reserves on the border with Chad is being investigated.

Annual inflation was estimated at 11% in 1984. However, salaries have not increased in line with prices, and the cost of living, measured in real terms, was estimated to have risen by 17% in the same year. The budget deficit for 1983 was initially estimated to be 7,500m. francs CFA, but by the end of that year had risen to nearer 10,000m. francs CFA. It was hoped to limit the 1984 budget deficit to 9,500m. francs CFA. The CAR relies heavily on foreign aid, especially from France, which provided 58% of aid from 1960 to 1984. French aid amounted to 14,000m. francs CFA in 1983, of which 5,000m. francs contributed to reducing the budget deficit. The current deficit on the balance of payments was US $16.5m. in 1980. It fell to $4.3m. in 1981 but reached $53.1m. in 1982, owing to the country's severe drought and stagnant economy. The deficit declined to $27.6m. in 1983. Accumulated arrears of debt service led to the rescheduling of payments in 1982 and 1983 on the part of Western governments. Outstanding foreign debt amounted to 91,000m. francs CFA in 1983.

The 1980/81 emergency social and economic Plan de Redressement involved expenditure of 98,000m. francs CFA, drawn largely from French and international aid, and was devoted to infrastructure and the agricultural sector. In 1982, following an interim plan for that year, the Government launched a three-year recovery programme for 1983–85, focusing on development projects totalling 31,300m. francs CFA in agriculture and transport infrastructure, and aiming to achieve a positive GDP growth rate. In July 1984 the IMF approved a 12-month stand-by arrangement, authorizing purchases up to the equivalent of 15m. SDRs in support of the Government's medium-term economic recovery programme. The programme aimed to achieve a 2.7% increase in GDP and a substantial reduction in budgetary and external deficits in 1984. A five-year plan was to be implemented for 1986–90.

Transport and Communications

Bangui is about 1,450 km (900 miles) from the sea but roads radiate east, north and west to Sudan, Chad and Cameroon respectively. The roads are in a poor state of repair but, with the help of international aid, 1,800 km (1,100 miles) were to be restored by 1983. Part of the Trans-Africa highway was completed in 1984, providing a link between the CAR and Cameroon. There are no railways, and the chief artery of transport is the Oubangui river, which flows into the Congo and thereby provides an outlet from Bangui to Brazzaville, the Congolese capital, from where a railway runs to the port of Pointe-Noire. There is an international airport at Mpoko, near Bangui, and numerous airfields allow for extensive internal services.

Social Welfare

An Employment Code guarantees a minimum wage for 60,000 employees and provides for the payment of benefits to compensate for accidents at work. There are 36 prefectorial hospitals, 36 maternity hospitals, 108 welfare centres and 200 first-aid centres. Only 84 physicians were working in the CAR in 1979.

Education

Education is officially compulsory for eight years between six and 14 years of age. Primary education begins at the age of six and lasts for six years. Secondary education begins at the age of 12 and lasts for seven years. In 1980 an estimated 54% of children in the relevant age-group (70% of boys; 39% of girls) attended primary schools, while secondary enrolment was equivalent to only 13% (boys 20%; girls 7%). According to estimates by UNESCO, the adult illiteracy rate in 1980 was 67% (males 52%; females 81%).

Tourism

The main tourist attractions are the waterfalls, the forests and many varieties of wild animals. There is excellent hunting and also opportunities for fishing. There were an estimated 86,000 tourist arrivals in 1980, when tourist receipts totalled US $15m.

RAILWAYS

There are no railways at present but there is a long-term project to connect Bangui to the Transcameroon railway. A railway is also due to be constructed from Sudan's Darfur provinces into the CAR's Vakaga province.

ROADS

In 1983 there were about 63,781 km of roads, including 6,172 km of routes nationales and 12,344 km of secondary roads. Both the total road length and the condition of the roads is inadequate for the traffic that uses the road system. Eight main routes leave Bangui, and those that are surfaced have been toll roads since 1971. The CAR section of the Trans-African Lagos–Mombasa highway was completed in 1984, providing a link with Cameroon.

INLAND WATERWAYS

There are two navigable waterways. The first is open all the year, except in the dry season, and is formed by the Congo and Oubangui rivers; convoys of barges (of up to 800 tons load) ply between Bangui, Brazzaville and Pointe-Noire. The second is the river Sangha, a tributary of the Oubangui, on which traffic is seasonal. There are two ports, at Bangui and Salo, on the rivers Oubangui and Sangha respectively. Efforts are being made to develop the stretch of river upstream from Salo to increase the transportation of timber from this area, and Nola will be developed as a timber port.

CHAD

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Chad is a land-locked country in north central Africa, bordered to the north by Libya, to the south by the Central African Republic, to the west by Niger and Cameroon and to the east by Sudan. The climate is hot and arid in the northern desert regions of the Sahara but very wet (annual rainfall 500 cm) in the south. The official language is French, but Arabic and various African languages are widely spoken. Almost one-half of the population are Muslims, living in the north, while most of the remainder follow animistic beliefs. About 5% are Christians. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) has three vertical stripes, of blue, yellow and red. The capital is N'Djamena (formerly called Fort-Lamy).

Recent History

Formerly a province of French Equatorial Africa, Chad became an autonomous state within the French Community in November 1958. François (later N'Garta) Tombalbaye, a southerner and leader of the Parti progressiste tchadien (PPT), became Prime Minister in March 1959. Chad achieved independence on 11 August 1960, with Tombalbaye as President. In 1962 President Tombalbaye banned all opposition parties and Chad became a single-party state. Civil disturbances began in 1963, with riots in the capital, and a full-scale rebellion broke out in 1965, concentrated mainly in the north, which had until that year remained under French military control. The Muslims of northern Chad have traditionally been in conflict with their black southern compatriots, who are generally animists or Christians. The banned National Liberation Front (FROLINAT) assumed leadership of the revolt, which was quelled in 1968 with French military help. In 1973 several leading figures of the regime, including the Army Chief of Staff, Gen. Félix Malloum, were imprisoned on conspiracy charges. The PPT was replaced by a new political party, the Mouvement national pour la révolution culturelle et sociale (MNRCS).

In April 1975 Tombalbaye was killed in an army coup led by the acting Chief of Staff. General Malloum was released and became President at the head of a Supreme Military Council. The provisional Government dissolved the MNRCS and launched appeals for national reconciliation. Some rebel leaders rallied to the regime, but FROLINAT remained unmoved, receiving clandestine support from Libya, which since 1973 had held the Aozou strip of northern Chad, covering about 70,000 sq km (27,000 sq miles) and believed to be rich in uranium.

In early 1978 FROLINAT refused to negotiate, unified its command under a Revolutionary Council, led by Gen. Goukouni Oueddei, and gained large areas of territory from government forces. The advance of FROLINAT was halted with the help of French reinforcements. In August Gen. Malloum sought a new solution to the conflict in a reshuffle of his government, and a former leader of FROLINAT, Hissène (Hissein) Habré, was appointed Prime Minister. Disagreements between Habré and Malloum soon arose, and by December central authority had completely broken down. Fighting between the Government and FROLINAT flared up again in January 1979. Habré's troops took control of most of the capital, forcing Malloum to flee the country, leaving responsibility with the commmander of the gendarmerie, Lt-Col Wadal Abdelkader Kamougue. French troops were sent to Chad, and a cease-fire was agreed.

With the failure of conferences held in Nigeria, the main factions, notably FROLINAT and FAN (Habré's Forces armées du nord), took the matter into their own hands, and in April a transitional government was formed under Lol Mahamat Choua, the newly-appointed leader of the Mouvement populaire pour la libération du Tchad, also known as the 'Third Army', which was supported by Nigeria. Goukouni Oueddei became Minister of the Interior, with Habré as Minister of Defence. This government pledged not to monopolize power, but it excluded the extreme factions of the south, now under Lt-Col Kamougue and supported by Libya. Several neighbouring countries, as well as dissatisfied internal factions, denounced the regime.

Sporadic fighting continued, and there was dissension within the Government between Goukouni and Habré. Finally, in August 1979, an agreement was reached between Chad's 11 factions for the formation of an interim Gouvernement d'union nationale de transition (GUNT) under the Presidency of Goukouni, with Lt-Col Kamougue of the southern extremists as Vice-President. A Council of Ministers, representing the various factions, was appointed in November 1979.

Goukouni's authority was undermined by continual disagreements with Habré's forces, and in March 1980 the shaky truce was broken and fighting began in the capital. Despite numerous attempts at mediation and cease-fire agreements, the conflict remained unresolved; in May all French troops withdrew from Chad, and in June a treaty of friendship was signed between Col Gaddafi of Libya and a representative of President Goukouni, without the prior consent of the GUNT. During October 1980 Libyan forces intervened directly in the hostilities, resulting in the defeat of Habré and the retreat of the FAN from N'Djamena. A Libyan force of 15,000 men was established in the country.

In January 1981 there were proposals for a gradual merger of Chad and Libya, but the Libyan presence in Chad was unpopular, and guerrilla warfare continued. Plans were drawn up in Lomé to provide for the formation of an OAU peacekeeping force, and calling for elections to take place during 1981. Habré and other FAN leaders were sentenced to death in absentia in June. By September President Goukouni had finally renounced the proposed merger, and Libyan troops were withdrawn in November at Goukouni's request. A neutral inter-African force was installed under the auspices of the OAU.

The OAU proposed a cease-fire date of 30 March 1982, and the holding of elections by July, but neither of these suggestions was implemented, and it became clear in early 1982 that a peaceful settlement was unlikely as President Goukouni refused to negotiate with Habré. In an attempt to strengthen the GUNT, weakened by internal conflicts, the President formed a Conseil d'Etat, appointed a Prime Minister and reshuffled the cabinet in May. Fighting had intensified, however, and by April Habré was in control of one-third of the territory. N'Djamena fell to his forces on 7 June. Goukouni fled to Cameroon and thence to Algeria, where he continued to contest the leadership. In October he formed a 15-member 'government-in-exile'. The OAU force had fully withdrawn by 30 June, and in October Habré took the oath as President and formed a new government. A majority of OAU members finally agreed to recognize Habré's regime in June 1983.

Habré did not succeed in establishing national reconciliation, although some members of Kamougue's Forces Armées tchadiennes (FAT) joined the ranks of the FAN to form a new national army in January 1983. By June 1983, however, Goukouni's rebel forces, with Libyan support, were in a position to capture the northern city of Faya-Largeau. Following appeals for international assistance, Habré obtained US $10m. of military aid from the USA, as well as help from Egypt, Sudan, France and Zaire. Government troops counter-attacked and repossessed Faya-Largeau at the end of July, but, after prolonged bombing by Libyan aircraft, the town again fell to the rebel forces in August. In response to Habré's renewed appeals, France sent 3,000 troops to Chad, ostensibly acting as military instructors, but with orders to retaliate should they come under attack.

In August a proposal from President Mitterrand of France for a Chad federation, as a solution to the dispute, was rejected by a spokesman for Goukouni Oueddei. At the Franco-African summit in October it was decided that the OAU should attempt to resolve the dispute by means of a reconciliation between the Government and the rebels. A defensive line separating the warring factions was set up along latitude 15°N, and in mid-September it was announced that fighting had ceased.

Following indications from both sides of a willingness to negotiate a peace settlement, a meeting of representatives from all factions was arranged for January 1984 in Addis Ababa. The talks collapsed, however, after a disagreement over protocol and representation. Renewed fighting in January led to the shooting down of a French aircraft and the death of its pilot, and prompted the French decision to extend the defensive zone 100 km northwards, to latitude 16°N. The French Foreign Minister, Claude Cheysson, visited Chad in February. His proposal to employ a Pan-African 'observer force', however, was rejected as impracticable by the OAU.

In an attempt to consolidate his political power, Habré dissolved his former military arm, FROLINAT-FAN, in June 1984 and created a new political party, the Union Nationale pour l'Indépendance. A government reshuffle followed in July. Major dissension among anti-Habré forces became evident with the formation in August of a new opposition movement, the Rassemblement des Forces Patriotiques, by GUNT factions opposed to Goukouni Oueddei's leadership.

Following a proposal in May 1984 by the Libyan leader, Col Gaddafi, for a simultaneous withdrawal of Libyan 'support elements' and French troops, a Franco-Libyan agreement was reached in September over joint evacuation of both countries' military forces. Chad was not consulted over the deal, and relations with France became strained. Following talks with President Mitterrand of France, however, Habré agreed to a joint Franco-Libyan commission monitoring the withdrawal. In mid-November it was announced that both countries' troops had been evacuated. US and Chad intelligence reports, however, maintained that 3,000 Libyan troops were still in the country, and Col Gaddafi subsequently acknowledged that some Libyan soldiers had remained, in contravention of the September agreement. At the Franco-African summit in December 1984, President Mitterrand declared that France would not use force to drive Libyans from northern Chad, and would intervene only if Libyan forces moved south of the 16th parallel.

The civil war in southern Chad between Habré's forces and various guerrilla commandos ('codos') escalated in October and November 1984, with the Government reportedly carrying out summary executions in an attempt to reassert its authority in the area. More than 50,000 Chadians were estimated to have fled to Sudan, the Central African Republic and Cameroon to escape increasing violence.

Government

The Government comprises a Council of Ministers headed by the President. Executive and legislative power is exercised by the Council, and for administrative purposes the country is divided into 14 Prefectures. In October 1982 a Conseil national consultatif was formed, consisting of two representatives of each Prefecture and two representatives of the city of N'Djamena.

Defence

In January 1983 the various armed groups in Chad which rallied to Hissène Habré's Forces armées du nord (FAN) were merged to form a new national army, the Forces armées nationales tchadiennes (FANT). The total strength of the armed forces in July 1984 was estimated to be 4,200 men. In addition, there are paramilitary forces of approximately 6,000 men. The gendarmerie, once part of the army, has been dissolved and replaced by a military police unit. Military service of 12 months is compulsory for men and women. Defence expenditure in 1983 was an estimated US $51.7m.

Economic Affairs

Chad is a severely underdeveloped country, owing partly to unfavourable climatic conditions, inadequate infrastructure and a paucity of known natural resources. During recent years, continual civil strife has aggravated economic difficulties. In 1982, according to World Bank estimates, Chad's GNP per head was only US $80 (at average 1980–82 prices), the lowest level among African countries and one of the lowest in the world. It was estimated that GNP per head declined by 2.8% annually, in real terms, between 1960 and 1982.

Chad's economy is essentially one of subsistence, based on agriculture, stock-breeding and fishing, which together occupy 90% of the working population. The only significant cash crop is cotton, which provides the basis for Chad's major industry and more than one-half of all export earnings. The country's output of seed (unginned) cotton reached a peak of 174,062 metric tons in 1975/76 but declined in subsequent years, falling to 71,000 tons in 1981/82, when fighting in the southern cotton-growing area severely affected production. Output increased to 102,000 tons in 1982/83 and reached 156,000 tons in 1983/84, the area under cultivation having increased from 133,899 ha in 1981/82 to 175,760 ha in 1983/84. Sugar cane is cultivated at a 6,000-ha agro-industrial complex at Banda, and is processed at a refinery operated by the Société nationale sucrière du Tchad. Annual domestic capacity is 30,000 tons of raw sugar. Production totalled 18,500 tons in 1982, increasing to 25,000 tons in 1983.

Lake Chad and the Logone-Chari basin are well stocked with fish, producing more than 100,000 tons annually. Despite government efforts to protect agriculture by irrigation and reafforestation, crops have been frequently threatened by recurring drought. Livestock normally accounts for about one-fifth of GDP, and is the most important export after cotton. An estimated 80% of meat exports, however, are smuggled out of the country, depriving the Government of substantial tax revenue.

Industry is almost entirely based on agriculture, with manufacturing accounting for only 7% of GDP. Textile production is the most important sector, followed by food and tobacco. There are proven reserves of petroleum near Lake Chad, but development has been hindered by political troubles. There are also known to be substantial deposits of uranium in the disputed northern territory.

After many years of civil war, Chad is now particularly dependent on foreign aid, with its economy in chaos, and many regions suffering critical food shortages. Drought has become increasingly severe and widespread since 1980, and in 1984 the cereals deficit was forecast at 300,000 tons. An estimated 2,000 people died of starvation during August–October 1984 as famine spread to the normally fertile southern areas. Emergency food aid has been supplied in recent years by the UN's World Food Programme and international donors.

The Habré government's budget for 1983 forecast total expenditure of 36,000m. francs CFA, with revenue from taxation at only 8,000m. francs CFA. The balance was to be financed out of foreign aid. Approximately 46% of public expenditure is allocated to defence. France is the main trading partner and the principal supplier of foreign aid; non-military aid from France totalled 12,000m. francs CFA in 1983. International agencies and Arab countries have provided help for agricultural and communications projects.

Transport and Communications

There are no railways in Chad. The river Chari is navigable from N'Djamena to Sarh in the far south. Roads are inadequate and only short stretches have been surfaced. There is an international airport, at N'Djamena, and more than 40 airfields.

Social Welfare

An Employment Code guarantees a minimum wage and other rights for employees. There are four hospitals, 28 medical centres and several hundred dispensaries. In 1978 there were 3,373 beds in government-administered hospital establishments, while only 90 physicians were employed in official medical services.

Education

Education is officially compulsory for six years between eight and 14 years of age. Primary education begins at the age of six and lasts for six years. Secondary education, from the age of 12, lasts for seven years, comprising a first cycle of four years and a second of three years. In 1976 only 25% of children in the primary age-group (37% of boys; 14% of girls) were enrolled at primary schools, while attendance at secondary schools was equivalent to only 3% of the relevant age-group. A National University was opened in 1971, and there are several technical colleges. In 1977 the estimated rate of adult illiteracy was 86%.

Tourism

Chad's potential attractions for tourists include a variety of scenery from the dense forests of the south to the deserts of the north. Wild animals abound, especially in the two national parks and five game reserves.

Transport

RAILWAYS

In 1962 Chad signed an agreement with Cameroon to extend the Transcameroon railway from N'Gaoundéré to Sarh, a distance of 500 km. Although the Transcameroon reached N'Gaoundéré in 1974, the proposed extension into Chad has been indefinitely postponed. Other possibilities are being explored of extending Sudanese and Nigerian lines into Chad.

ROADS

In 1976 there were 30,725 km of roads, of which 4,628 km were national roads and 3,512 km were secondary roads. There are also some 20,000 km of tracks suitable for motor traffic during the dry season from October to July. A 4,840-km motor track leads from Rouiba, in Algeria, to Chad. There are projects for road links between N'Djamena and Tripoli, and between Moundou and N'Gaoundéré.

Coopérative des Transportateurs Tchadiens (COPORTCHAD): BP 336, N'Djamena; road haulage; Pres. SALEH KHALIFA.

INLAND WATERWAYS

There is a certain amount of traffic on the Chari and Logone rivers which meet just south of N'Djamena. Both routes, from Sarh to N'Djamena on the Chari and from Bongor and Moundou to N'Djamena on the Logone, are open only during the wet season, August–December, and provide a convenient alternative when roads become impassable.

CHILE

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Chile is a long, narrow country lying along the Pacific coast of South America, extending from Peru and Bolivia in the north to Cape Horn in the far south. It is separated from Argentina, to the east, by the high Andes mountains. Both the mountains and the cold Humboldt Current influence the climate; between Arica in the north and Punta Arenas in the extreme south, a distance of about 4,000 km (2,500 miles), the average maximum temperature varies by no more than 13°C. Rainfall varies widely between the arid desert in the north and the rainy south. The language is Spanish. There is no state religion but the great majority of the inhabitants profess Christianity, and more than 85% are adherents of the Roman Catholic Church. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) is divided horizontally: the lower half is red, while the upper half has a five-pointed white star on a blue square, at the hoist, with the remainder white. The capital is Santiago.

Recent History

Chile was ruled by Spain from the 16th century until its independence in 1818. For most of the 19th century it was governed by a small oligarchy of land-owners. Chile won the War of the Pacific (1879–83) against Peru and Bolivia. Most of the present century has been marked by the struggle for power between right- and left-wing forces.

In September 1970 Dr Salvador Allende Gossens, the Marxist candidate of Unidad Popular, a coalition of five left-wing parties including the Communist Party, was elected to succeed Eduardo Frei Montalva, a Christian Democrat who was President between 1964 and 1970. Allende promised to transform Chilean society by constitutional means, and imposed an extensive nationalization programme. The Government failed to obtain a congressional majority in the elections of March 1973 and was confronted with a deteriorating economic situation as well as an intensification of violent opposition to its policies. Accelerated inflation led to food shortages and there were repeated clashes between pro- and anti-Government activists. The armed forces finally intervened in September 1973, claiming that a military take-over was necessary because of the increasingly anarchic situation and economic breakdown. President Allende died during the coup.

Congress was dissolved, all political activity banned and strict censorship introduced. The military junta dedicated itself to the eradication of Marxism and the reconstruction of Chile, and its leader, Gen. Augusto Pinochet Ugarte, became Supreme Chief of State in June and President in December 1974. The junta has been widely criticized abroad for its repressive policies and violations of human rights. Critics of the regime were tortured and imprisoned, and several thousand disappeared. Some of those who had been imprisoned were released, as a result of international pressure, and sent into exile.

In September 1976 three constitutional acts were promulgated with the aim of creating an 'authoritarian democracy'. All political parties were banned in March 1977, when the state of siege was extended. Following a UN General Assembly resolution in December 1977, condemning the Government for violating human rights, Gen. Pinochet called a referendum in January 1978 to endorse the regime's policies. As more than 75% of the voters supported the President in his defence of Chile 'in the face of international aggression', he felt able to lift the state of siege, in force since 1973, and replace it by a state of emergency.

A plebiscite in September 1980 showed a 67% vote in favour of a new constitution which had been drawn up by the Government, although dubious electoral practices were allegedly employed. The new constitution was described as providing a 'transition to democracy' but, although Gen. Pinochet ceased to be head of the armed forces, the state of emergency was extended and the additional clauses allowed him to maintain his firm hold on power until 1989. Political murders and the use of torture by the security forces continued.

Opposition to the Government from all sectors of the population, including church leaders, increased, however, and industrial and agricultural interests demanded changes in economic policies. Political demonstrations were violently broken up. In May 1983 a five-member union confederation was formed to demand the restoration of democracy. Monthly demonstrations took place in the capital and the major cities, and the population of Santiago joined in the periodic 'caceroleos', when the banging of kitchen utensils and the sounding of car horns created a deafening form of protest. President Pinochet ordered rough treatment for the demonstrators, thousands of whom were rounded up and interrogated. The armed forces fired into the crowds, and by October 1983 hundreds had been injured and a total of 68 deaths had been recorded. Gen. Pinochet received world-wide condemnation. Trade union leaders were arrested and sent into internal exile and union members who went on strike to demand their release were dismissed. The copper mines were put under military control.

Political parties, which were still officially outlawed, re-emerged, and in July 1983 five centre parties formed a coalition, the 'Alianza Democrática', demanding a return to democratic rule within 18 months. A left-wing coalition was also created. Pinochet threatened opposition politicians with exile, but his own position became uncertain when members of the armed forces began to speak out against him. A 'state of internal disturbance' was declared in September, and a law banning unauthorized demonstrations was decreed in October, although, at the same time, Gen. Pinochet attempted to placate workers and debtors with populist measures and public works projects. More than 1,000 exiles were allowed to return. In August the new Minister of the Interior announced that a referendum might be held to allow for an elected congress to be installed before 1989.

An anti-government campaign of bombings, begun in late 1983 and directed principally against electricity installations, continued throughout 1984. In response, in January 1984 the Government announced new anti-terrorist legislation and extensive security measures. In March a 90-day state of siege was declared, and various opposition publications were censored. Six people were killed during a national day of protest. A further wave of bombings struck Chile's principal cities in May; during one night 40 bombs exploded in Santiago. The first May Day rally in Santiago since 1973 was attended by 150,000 people, and public protests were held throughout the country. As the eleventh anniversary of the 1973 coup approached, the political opposition was joined in its criticism of Gen. Pinochet by the Roman Catholic Church. Relations between Church and State had deteriorated after anti-Government demonstrations at Punta Arenas in February, for which the Government had blamed the Church. Two days of violent clashes between police and demonstrators in September resulted in nine deaths, including that of a French priest. Widespread arrests were carried out, and the President's special powers were extended for six months. Following the demonstrations, the opposition announced its intention to call a general strike in October. During the two days of protests accompanying the strike, a further nine people were killed, and police raids on the suburbs of Santiago resulted in a large number of detentions. In November another state of siege was declared for 90 days, and the offices of opposition parties and publications were raided. Two more days of anti-Government protests met with a muted response from the public.

In February 1984 the Council of State began drafting a law to legalize political parties and to prepare for elections in 1989. In March Gen. Pinochet confirmed that a plebiscite would be held at an unspecified time to decide on a timetable for the elections. In September, however, Gen. Pinochet firmly rejected any possibility of a return to civilian rule before 1989. In November the entire Cabinet resigned, prompted by the earlier resignation of the Minister of the Interior. It was thought that the Government was preparing to adopt a more severe line towards the opposition, in an attempt to conceal a division of opinion within its ranks over the transfer of power.

Chile has two border disputes: to the north with Bolivia and to the south with Argentina. In 1978 Bolivia broke off diplomatic relations with Chile on the grounds that it had not shown sufficient flexibility over the question of Bolivia's access to the Pacific Ocean. Chile's dispute with Argentina concerns three small islands in the Beagle Channel, south of Tierra del Fuego. The issue of sovereignty over these islands has, on occasions, brought the two countries to the verge of war. In December 1978 the case was referred to papal mediation and the resultant proposals were presented to the two governments in December 1980. Argentina failed to agree to the proposals, but in March 1984 a draft settlement was agreed. In October it was announced that total agreement had been reached. Under the terms of the settlement, Chile was awarded 12 islands and islets to the south of the Beagle Channel, including Lennox, Picton and Nueva. The agreement required the formal approval of the ruling junta before ratification by Gen. Pinochet.

Government

Chile is a republic, divided into 12 regions and a metropolitan area. Since the coup in September 1973 the country has been ruled by a military junta. In 1975 a Council of State was established to draft a new constitution, which was promulgated in March 1981 and will take full effect from 1989 (see Constitution). Meanwhile, executive and legislative power is vested in the President and the junta, assisted by a Cabinet. The clause stating that all Chilean nationals must obey the national authorities was effective from October 1980.

Defence

Military service in the army or the navy lasts two years and is compulsory for men at 19 years of age. In July 1984 the army had a strength of 53,000, the air force 15,000 and the navy 28,000. Paramilitary security forces number about 27,000 carabineros. Defence expenditure for 1984 was expected to be US $1,600m.

Economic Affairs

In 1973 the junta inherited an economy with inflation between 500 and 1,000%, low reserves and a declining GDP. The Allende Government had introduced wide-ranging state control but the Pinochet Government attempted to establish a market-oriented economy by encouraging foreign investment, by denationalizing most of the enterprises which the Allende Government had nationalized, and by drastically reducing import tariffs. After slow growth in earlier years, production expanded considerably in 1977, when the GDP rose by 9.7%, compared with a decline of 14.3% in 1975.

After the coup in 1973, the military regime reversed the agricultural reforms which had been introduced by President Allende: about 30% of the agricultural land which had been redistributed was returned to its original owners, while a further 20% was auctioned. State assistance to small farmers ended.

In 1981 about 15% of the working population were engaged in agriculture, but the sector contributes less than 10% of the GDP. Although the country has great agricultural potential, land use is inefficient. The Government's refusal to protect domestic production against cheaper imports resulted in sharp falls in the production of wheat (down 29%), barley, oats, rye, oil-seeds and fruit in 1981, although production of rice, potatoes, maize and sugar beet increased. Agricultural production continued to decline in 1982. The area sown with rice fell by 17.9%. By 1983 the area sown to wheat, oats, barley, maize and rye was 35% less than in 1975. Dependence on imports increased. Wheat production fell by an estimated 40%, to 586,000 tons, in 1983, the decline being aggravated by severe drought. In 1982 imports of wheat accounted for 60% of the total consumed. In the same period imports of oil-seeds rose from 50% to 90% of the total consumed. In 1983/84 production of major crops improved. Wheat production rose to 998,000 tons and maize output increased from 512,000 tons in 1982/83 to 721,000 tons in 1983/84. Sugar beet production rose from 1.64m. tons in 1982/83 to 2.19m. tons in 1983/84. The sector was expected to grow by over 7% in 1984. The Government has announced plans to invest 2,400m. pesos in the sector over the next three years.

Wood and wood products form the second most important export sector (after copper), accounting for nearly 10% of export earnings in 1980. Fishing also has great development potential, with the total catch reaching 3,673,000 metric tons in 1982. However, a decline in large-scale fishing has slowed growth.

Chile is the world's leading producer of copper, and accounted for 17% of global output in 1981. Its total reserves are estimated to represent 23% of the world's proven resources and are concentrated in the Chuquicamata and El Teniente mines. Copper generates more than 50% of Chile's foreign exchange and the industry accounts for 10% of GDP. Chile's production of copper rose to a record 1.3m. metric tons in 1983, compared with 1.08m. tons in 1981. However, copper's share of total exports by value was reduced from 83% in 1973 to 44% in 1981, partly as a result of fluctuations in world demand. By 1982 the world price of copper, in real terms, had fallen to its lowest level for 50 years. In spite of an improvement in the first half of 1983, prices continued to decline and the sector expected losses in earnings of US $300m. in 1984. The output of gold increased by 29% in 1982 and reached 17.2 tons in 1983. Chile has the largest known reserves of lithium.

Other minerals of economic importance are iron ore (for domestic consumption and export, mainly to Japan), molybdenum, manganese, lead, zinc, silver, mercury, gold, limestone, marble, coal, nitrates and iodine. Petroleum and natural gas are found in the south. Chile imports 57% of its petroleum requirements but, with the discovery of large new deposits in the Magellan Straits, it is hoped to satisfy domestic oil consumption by 2003. It was planned to build a natural gas liquefaction complex at Cabo Negro, with an initial production of 7m. cu m of LNG per day by 1984. Other domestic resources of energy, such as coal and hydroelectricity are also being developed rapidly. Chile's potential hydroelectric generating capacity is estimated to be 18.7m. kW. The Antuco plant has a capacity of 300,000 kW and the Colbún-Machicura project, which is currently under construction, has a planned capacity of 490,000 kW. In 1984 Chile announced plans to purchase seven hydroelectric power stations from the People's Republic of China.

Manufacturing, which accounted for about 21% of the GDP in 1980, faced very strong foreign competition after the Government's drastic reduction of import duties. Industrial production rose by 5% in 1980, and by 1.2% in 1981. Following the onset of the economic recession in mid-1981, demand slumped and high interest rates forced many businesses into liquidation. Industrial production fell by 21% in 1982. By January 1983, 61,000 small businesses were unable to pay debts and were declared insolvent, including 12 subsidiaries of the two leading industrial groups, Vial and Cruzat/Larraín. Despite claims of improved industrial output towards the end of 1983, retail traders reported a 27% drop in sales for the year, while construction was at its lowest level for two years. Industrial production was expected to increase by 9.2% in 1984. The Government's three-year plan, announced in 1984, revealed plans to reactivate the industrial sector by investing 4,373m. pesos and creating 400,000 new jobs.

The economic decline which began in 1981 was the most spectacular in Latin America. Between 1977 and 1980 gross fixed investment represented 15.2% of GNP, one of the lowest ratios in the region. Foreign loans, which had been used for importing consumer goods and for speculation on the lucrative financial market, were no longer forthcoming by mid-1981. The collapse of the domestic economy and the numerous bankruptcies of private companies led to pressure on the private banks, which were unable to service their foreign debts, amounting to US $7,000m. by January 1983. The liquidation of several private banks panicked depositors into withdrawing a total of about US $1,000m. in January 1983 alone. Chile's reserves of foreign exchange declined from $4,099m. in September 1981 to $1,218m. in April 1983. GDP contracted by 14.1% in 1982. A decline in world prices for copper, molybdenum and timber led to trade deficits of $2,477m. in 1981 and $2,600m. in 1982.

In January 1983 Chile's foreign debt, which was US $3,500m.

in 1973, reached $17,454m. (representing the highest level of debt per inhabitant in the world), of which 64% was of the private sector. In July 1983 agreement was reached with Chile's foreign bank creditors on the rescheduling of $3,400m., new loans amounting to $1,300m. and the maintenance of $1,200m. in trade credits. A loan of $900m. from the IMF was signed in January 1983, on the condition that strict monetarist policies would be imposed, and the budget deficit reduced to 2.3% of GDP, compared with 4% in 1982. By March it was clear that the conditions had not been fulfilled and that the budget deficit would be at least 5–6% of GDP in 1983. GDP declined by 1.6% in 1983. The current deficit on the balance of payments declined from $4,733m. in 1981 to $1,068m. in 1983. By December 1983 Chile's foreign exchange reserves had risen to US $2,031m. The peso was devalued, taxes raised and import tariffs doubled to 20%. The IMF agreed to continue the loan payments.

In 1984 the economy showed signs of a modest recovery, and GDP was estimated to have grown by 5.5%. Debt servicing was rendered more difficult by the continuing decline in world copper prices. However, by June 1984 Chile's foreign exchange reserves had risen to US $2,286m. The Government expected exports to increase by 7% in 1984. In February the Government revealed its plans for economic recovery, which included an increase in the permitted budget deficit to 4.6% of GDP. The Government intended to finance the deficit with a loan of US $1,500m. In May the IMF approved the Government's programme, and a loan of US $780m. was secured from foreign banks. In July, however, Chile announced that it would be unable to repay any of the principal due on its foreign debt (then standing at US $18,600m.) for the next five years. Interest payments would be maintained. In September the peso was devalued from 93 to 115 per US dollar. Import duties were increased to 35% to compensate for rising dollar interest rates and falling copper prices. In November Chile commenced negotiations on a further loan of US $800m. and debt rescheduling. New appointments at the Economy and Finance Ministries in April did not result in the changes in the Government's economic policy which had been anticipated.

Inflation was an estimated 27.3% in 1983, but declined to 15.2% by August 1984. Workers' salaries in the private sector lost 50% in purchasing power between August 1981 and October 1983. In October 1984 the Government announced substantial increases of up to 100% in salaries to compensate for price rises in 1984. Unemployment stood at about 33% in August 1983, and 13% of the labour force was employed in a system of minimum employment.

Transport and Communications

The difficult topography of Chile, including mountains, forest and desert, makes communications a formidable problem. The traditional means of communication is the sea. The chief ports are Valparaíso, Talcahuano, Antofagasta, San Antonio and Punta Arenas. In 1984 there were 8,100 km of railways. In 1983 there were 88,129 km of roads, of which 10.8% were paved. The principal airports are Chacalluta, 14 km north-east of Arica, and Arturo Merino Benítez, 20 km north-east of Santiago. There are plans to extend the provincial airport network.

Social Welfare

Employees, including agricultural workers, may receive benefits for sickness, unemployment, accidents at work, maternity and retirement, and there are dependants' allowances, including family allowances. In May 1981 social security was transferred to the private sector, and run by the Administradoras de Fondo de Pensiones. All but one of the funds and 40% of the worker investors made losses, totalling US $95m., in 1981. A National Health Service was established in 1952. In 1978 there were 38,622 hospital beds, and in 1979 there were 5,671 physicians.

Education

Primary education is free and compulsory for eight years. Secondary education is divided into the general programme, geared towards general education and possible entrance to university (lasting four years), and the technical-professional programme geared towards specialist training (lasting five years). An intensive national literacy campaign, launched in 1980, reduced the rate of adult illiteracy from 11% in 1970 to an estimated 5.6% in 1983. The university law of January 1981 banned all political activity in universities, reduced the number of degree courses from 33 to 12, halved future government funding and encouraged the establishment of private specialized universities.

Tourism

Chile has a wide variety of attractions for the tourist, including fine beaches, ski resorts in the Andes, lakes and rivers. There are many opportunities for hunting and fishing in the southern archipelago, where there are plans to make an integrated tourist area with Argentina, requiring investment of US $120m.

Public Holidays

1985: 1 May (Labour Day), 21 May (Battle of Iquique), 15 August (Assumption), 18 September (Independence Day), 12 October (Day of the Race), 1 November (All Saints' Day), 8 December (Immaculate Conception), 25 December (Christmas Day), 31 December (Bank Holiday).

1986: 1 January (New Year's Day), 28, 29 March (Good Friday and Easter Saturday).

The Constitution

Note: Since 1973 Government has been based on the three Constitutional Acts (see below). In accordance with the new Constitution approved by a plebiscite in 1980, the previous 1925 Constitution was abolished and the new Fundamental Law came into effect in March 1981. Provisions concerning the National Congress will be fully effective from 1989.

The three constitutional acts of 1976 provide for a 'new democratic structure' for Chilean society based on the family and rejecting class struggle. The following rights are guaranteed: the right to life and personal integrity, to a defence, to personal liberty and individual security; the right to reside in, cross or leave the country; the right of assembly, petition, association and free expression and the right to work. Men and women are accorded equal rights; no-one shall be obliged to join any association; any group considered to be contrary to morality, public order or state security shall be prohibited; the courts shall be able to prohibit any publication or broadcast considered to be contrary to public morality, order, national security or individual privacy.

The 1981 constitution, described as a 'transition to democracy', separates the presidency from the junta and provides for presidential elections every eight years, with no re-election. The President may dissolve the legislature once during his term of office and may declare a state of emergency for up to 20 days. The bicameral legislature will consist of an upper chamber of 26 elected and nine appointed senators, who are to serve an eight-year term, and a lower chamber of 120 deputies elected for a four-year term. All former presidents are to be senators for life. There is a National Security Council consisting of the President, the Junta (comprising the heads of the armed forces and the police) and the presidents of the Supreme Court and the Senate.

All Marxist and 'totalitarian' groups are banned, limited political activity will be permitted only at the end of the 'transitional period', and there is no amnesty for terrorists. There is limited freedom of assembly and of expression: workers in public or vital sectors may not strike and other employees may strike for no more than 60 days; it is illegal to disseminate doctrines of a 'totalitarian' concept or ones which undermine public morals. The economy is based on the free market system. Abortion is prohibited.

Appended are 29 Transitory Clauses which had immediate effect in March 1981. The holding of elections is postponed until 1989, when the Junta will nominate the president and the 'no re-election' clause will be suspended. The nomination will be submitted to a referendum.

All 'Marxist' political parties were declared unlawful on 14 September 1973, and the activities of all political parties were suspended on 27 September 1973. All political parties and political activity were banned on 12 March 1977. New legislation regarding party activity was enacted in 1984.

The Press

Most newspapers of nationwide circulation in Chile are published in Santiago. Since the assumption of power by the military government there has been some form of censorship in force. A decree introduced in 1981 makes it illegal for the press to 'emphasize or highlight news related to terrorist or extremist acts which have occurred within the country'. In 1984 more stringent regulations concerning censorship were imposed.

TRADE UNIONS

In September 1973 the Central Única de Trabajadores de Chile was outlawed as it was deemed to be a political organ of the Communist Party. Trade union activities have been severely curtailed under the present regime and in 1978 seven trade union federations, representing 529 trade unions and some 400,000 workers were banned, as they were deemed to be Marxist, and their property confiscated.

New labour legislation introduced in 1979 and embodied in the 1981 constitution included: the right of association; that unions are to be organized only on a company basis; that the Government's right to control union budgets is to be abolished; that union representatives must not engage in any political activity; that strikes involving stoppages to essential public services or which endanger national security are to be prohibited and that strikes may last no longer than 60 days.

There are over 20 national labour federations and unions. The confederations include:

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The People's Republic of China covers a vast area of eastern Asia, with Mongolia to the north, the USSR to the north and west, Afghanistan and Pakistan to the west, and India, Nepal, Bhutan, Burma, Laos and Viet-Nam to the south. The country borders the Democratic People's Republic of Korea in the north-east, and has a long coastline on the Pacific Ocean. The climate ranges from sub-tropical in the far south to an annual average temperature of below 10°C (50°F) in the north, and from the monsoon climate of East China to the aridity of the north-west. The principal language is Northern Chinese (Mandarin); in the south and south-east local dialects are spoken. The Xizangzu (Tibetans), Wei Wuer (Uighurs), Menggus (Mongols) and other groups have their own languages. The traditional religions and philosophies of life are Confucianism, Buddhism and Daoism. There are also small Muslim and Christian minorities. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) is plain red with one large and four small five-pointed gold stars in the upper hoist. The capital is Beijing (Peking).

Recent History

The People's Republic of China was proclaimed on 1 October 1949, following the victory of Communist forces over the Kuomintang government, which fled to the island province of Taiwan. The new Communist regime received widespread international recognition, but it was not until 1971 that the People's Republic was admitted to the United Nations, in place of the Kuomintang regime, as the representative of China. Most other countries now recognize the People's Republic.

With the establishment of the People's Republic, the leading figure in China's political affairs was Mao Zedong, who was Chairman of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) from 1935 until his death in 1976. Chairman Mao, as he was known, also became Head of State in October 1949 but he relinquished this post in December 1958. His successor was Liu Shaoqi, First Vice-Chairman of the CCP, who was elected Head of State in April 1959. Liu was dismissed in October 1968, during the Cultural Revolution (see below), and died in prison in 1969. The post of Head of State was left vacant, and was formally abolished in January 1975, when a new Constitution (replacing that of 1954) was adopted.

The first Premier (Head of Government) of the People's Republic was Zhou Enlai, who held this office from October 1949 until his death in 1976. Zhou was also Minister of Foreign Affairs from 1949 to 1958, and subsequently remained largely responsible for China's international relations.

In the early years of the People's Republic, China was dependent on the USSR for economic and military aid, and Chinese planning was based on the Soviet model, with highly centralized control. From 1955 onwards, however, Mao Zedong set out to develop a distinctively Chinese form of socialism. As a result of increasingly strained relations between Chinese and Soviet leaders, partly as a result of ideological differences, the USSR withdrew all technical aid to China in August 1960. Chinese hostility to the USSR increased, and was aggravated by territorial disputes between the two countries.

Sino-Soviet friction was accompanied by an improvement in China's relations with Japan and the West during the 1970s. Almost all Western countries had recognized the Government of the People's Republic as the sole legitimate government of China, and had consequently withdrawn recognition from the 'Republic of China', which had been confined to Taiwan since 1949. The People's Republic claimed Taiwan as an integral part of its territory, although the island remained to be 'liberated'. For many years, however, the USA refused to recognize the People's Republic but, instead, regarded the Taiwan regime as the legitimate Chinese government. In February 1972 President Richard Nixon of the USA visited the People's Republic and acknowledged that 'Taiwan is a part of China'. In January 1979 the USA recognized the People's Republic and severed diplomatic relations with Taiwan.

The economic progress which was achieved during the early years of Communist rule enabled China to withstand the effects of the industrialization programmes of the late 1950s (called the 'Great Leap Forward'), the drought of 1960–62 and the withdrawal of Soviet aid in 1960. To prevent the establishment of a ruling class, Chairman Mao launched the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution in 1966. The ensuing excesses of the Red Guards caused the army to intervene; Liu Shaoqi, Head of State, and Deng Xiaoping, General Secretary of the CCP, were disgraced. In 1971 an attempted coup by the Defence Minister, Marshal Lin Biao, was unsuccessful, and by 1973 it was apparent that Chairman Mao and Premier Zhou Enlai had retained power. In 1975 Deng Xiaoping re-emerged as first Vice-Premier and Chief of the General Staff. Zhou Enlai died in January 1976. Hua Guofeng, hitherto Minister of Public Security, was appointed Premier, and Deng was dismissed. Mao died in September 1976. His widow, Jiang Qing, tried unsuccessfully to seize power, with the help of three radical members of the CCP's Politburo. The 'gang of four' and six associates of Lin Biao were tried in November 1980. All were found guilty.

In October 1976 Hua Guofeng succeeded Mao as Chairman of the CCP and Commander-in-Chief of the People's Liberation Army. The 11th Congress of the CCP, held in August 1977, restored Deng Xiaoping to his former posts. In September 1980 Hua Guofeng resigned as Premier but retained his chairmanship of the CCP. The appointment of Zhao Ziyang, a Deputy Premier since April 1980, to succeed Hua as Premier, confirmed the dominance of the moderate faction of Deng Xiaoping. In June 1981 Hua Guofeng was replaced as Chairman of the CCP by Hu Yaobang, former Secretary-General of the Politburo, and as Chairman of the Military Affairs Commission by Deng Xiaoping. A sustained campaign by Deng to purge the Politburo of leftist elements led to Hua's demotion to a Vice-Chairman of the CCP and, in September 1982, to his exclusion from the Politburo.

In March 1982 the State Council (Cabinet) was restructured, and the number of ministries reduced, in order to combat bureaucracy, while in September the CCP was reorganized and the post of Party Chairman abolished. Hu Yaobang became, instead, General Secretary of the CCP. In October 1983 a 'rectification' (purge) of the CCP was launched, aimed at expelling 'Maoists', who had risen to power during the Cultural Revolution, and those opposed to the pragmatic policies of Deng. China's new Constitution, adopted in December 1982, restored the office of Head of State, and in June 1983 Li Xiannian, a former Minister of Finance, was elected President of China by the sixth National People's Congress.

In 1983–84 several moves were made to consolidate the authority of the Government: following the announcement of a major anti-crime drive in late 1983, thousands of people were reported to have been executed, while at the same time a campaign was launched against 'spiritual pollution'; stricter censorship was introduced to limit the effects of Western cultural influences. The reorganization of the CCP continued, and several senior cadres were dismissed or discredited. The second session of the Sixth National People's Congress, held in May 1984, endorsed these changes and emphasized that economic development would continue to be China's main priority. A programme of modernization for the armed forces continued during 1984, culminating in October in a large-scale military parade through Beijing to mark the 35th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic. Deng Xiaoping expressed his intention to rejuvenate the army, by encouraging senior officers to give way to younger leaders, while in July and October 1984 five members of the State Council were replaced by considerably younger politicians. It was announced in September that the CCP would hold its next congress in 1985, two years earlier than scheduled, when it was expected that a new Central Committee would be elected.

China condemned Viet-Nam's invasion of Kampuchea in December 1978, and launched a punitive attack into northern Viet-Nam in February 1979. Armed clashes across the border have continued, and talks between the two countries have failed. Taiwan has repeatedly rejected China's proposals for reunification, under which Taiwan would become a 'special administrative region'. China has, however, confirmed its intention to re-establish sovereignty over Hong Kong when the existing lease on most of the territory expires in 1997; in September 1984, following protracted negotiations, China reached agreement with the British Government over the terms of Chinese administration of the territory after that date. High-level talks with Soviet officials in 1982–84 marked a thaw in Sino-Soviet relations, despite a setback following China's rapprochement with the USA in 1984: Premier Zhao Ziyang visited Washington in January, and President Ronald Reagan visited Beijing in April, when a bilateral agreement on industrial and technological co-operation was signed. The main obstacle to Sino-US relations remains the question of Taiwan, and, in particular, the continued sale of US armaments to Taiwan. China's 'open door' policy has led to increased contacts with a wide range of countries; in early 1983, for example, Zhao Ziyang undertook an 11-nation tour of Africa, and in June 1984 he visited six West European countries.

Government

China is a unitary state. Directly under the Central Government there are 21 provinces, five autonomous regions, including Xizang (Tibet), and three municipalities (Beijing, Shanghai and Tianjin). The highest organ of state power is the National People's Congress (NPC). In 1984 the NPC had 2,978 deputies, indirectly elected for five years by the provinces, autonomous regions, municipalities directly under the central government, and the People's Liberation Army. The NPC elects a Standing Committee to be its permanent organ. The current Constitution, adopted by the NPC in December 1982, was China's fourth since 1949. It restored the office of Head of State (President of the Republic).

Executive power is exercised by the State Council (Cabinet), comprising the Premier, Vice-Premiers and other Ministers heading ministries and commissions. The State Council is appointed by, and accountable to, the NPC.

Local people's congresses are the local organs of state power. Local revolutionary committees, created during the Cultural Revolution, were abolished in January 1980 and replaced by local people's governments.

Defence

China is divided into 11 major military units. All armed services are grouped in the People's Liberation Army (PLA). In July 1984, according to Western estimates, the regular forces totalled 4,000,000: the army numbered 3,160,000, the navy 350,000, and the air force 490,000. There is also a public security force and a civilian militia. All males are conscripted and military service lasts for three years in the army, for four years in the air force, and for five years in the navy. Defence expenditure for 1984 was officially reported at 17,870m. yuan.

Economic Affairs

Agriculture represents about one-quarter of China's total national output, and employed about 75% of the working population in 1982. China, with 22% of the world's population, accounts for 15% of the world's production of cereals and groundnuts, and almost 40% of the world's pig numbers. China is the world's largest producer of rice, accounting for 35% of the world harvest in 1981. The gross value of China's farm output increased by about 50% in the decade up to 1978. In 1983 agricultural output grew by 9.5%, compared with an increase of 11.2% in 1982. The 1983 harvest of grain (cereals, pulses and tubers in 'grain equivalent') exceeded all expectations, reaching a record 387.3m. tons, following the successful implementation of a system of 'rural responsibility' which provided more incentives for agricultural workers.

China has large mineral deposits, such as coal and iron ore, which serve the iron and steel works at Anshan, Shanghai, Baotou, Wuhan and smaller plants elsewhere. Other important minerals include tungsten, molybdenum, antimony, tin, lead, mercury, bauxite, phosphate rock and manganese. The gross value of China's industrial output doubled in the decade to 1978. Since 1979 emphasis has shifted from heavy to light industry, but in 1982 heavy industry unexpectedly grew by 9.3% in terms of output value, while light industry grew by only 5.6%, reversing the trend of previous years. In 1983 the output of heavy industry increased by 12.4% over 1982, while light industry grew by 8.7%. More than 900m. yuan was allocated to the development of China's chemical industry in 1984, while the electronics sector is of growing importance and has moved into areas of high technology, such as microelectronics, satellite communications and computer technology. The energy sector is being given priority in development; in April 1984 an extensive nuclear power programme was published, and in August the discovery of further recoverable reserves of natural gas in the South China Sea was announced. The potential generating capacity of hydroelectric power in China is estimated at 680m. kW, of which 380m. kW are exploitable. The petroleum industry is expanding steadily, although four-fifths of the country's fuel and power needs are still met by coal. Since 1973 China has been self-sufficient in petroleum and its derivatives, and in 1983 the country produced 106.1m. tons of crude petroleum. By the end of 1983, foreign oil companies had invested US $490m. in the exploration of China's offshore petroleum reserves, one of the principal areas for joint-venture contracts. China is developing its own petrochemical industries, including fibres and plastics, and is a major producer and consumer of nitrogenous fertilizers.

The development of the economy since 1953 has been within the framework of five-year plans, but recessions occurred in the wake of the Great Leap Forward (1958–60) and during the Cultural Revolution (1966–68). In 1980 it was decided to replace the unrealistic 1976–85 Plan by a Ten-Year Plan (1981–90) and a Five-Year Plan (1981–85), and to slow down the 'four modernizations' (agriculture, industry, defence, and science and technology). In 1984 it was reported that several of the 1985 production targets had been achieved two years ahead of schedule; the new Five-Year Plan (1986–90) aims to slow industrial growth and to concentrate on major economic reforms, especially in the sectors of banking, agriculture and pricing policy. In 1983 net material product (NMP) increased by an estimated 9% over the 1982 total. An ambitious development programme is under way, calling for output from agriculture and industry to quadruple between 1980 and 2000.

In 1983 the value of imports increased by 17.9% over the 1982 total, while exports grew by 5.8%. However, the value of exports was 1,650m. yuan higher than that of imports. Since the late 1970s China has pursued a much more liberal economic policy. Joint ventures and the acceptance of foreign loans are now permitted, and commercial links have been diversified. Four 'Special Economic Zones' have been set up, with more autonomy and flexibility, in an attempt to attract foreign investment; by January 1984 they had attracted $2,800m. in foreign investment, and it was announced in May that 14 coastal cities were also to be opened for investment. The commune system is being downgraded, and a degree of free enterprise is now encouraged as a means of raising living standards (the per caput annual income of peasants rose by 14.7% between 1982 and 1983). Further liberal reforms include measures to introduce capitalist-style market forces and to reduce central government control, with increased incentives for workers and a new system of taxes. It is hoped that the successes of the reforms in China's agriculture can thus be transferred to industry. China has no serious problems with its balance of payments, but trade deficits are being met in part by deferred payments in Japan and Western Europe. In 1983 official figures for China's foreign debt were published for the first time; total debts at the end of September stood at US $3,000m., mainly to the IMF, the World Bank and Japan.

Transport and Communications

The total length of railways measured 51,600 km in 1983. Roads are unevenly developed; national and provincial highways total more than 900,000 km. About 57,000 km of inland waterways are navigable by steamships. Coastal shipping is important, and the merchant fleet is expanding rapidly. There are international airports at Beijing and Xiamen.

Social Welfare

Western and traditional Chinese medical attention is available in the cities and, to a lesser degree, in rural areas. A fee is charged. In 1981 there were 1.2m. doctors and 190,000 health establishments (including 66,000 hospitals). About 1.4m. 'barefoot doctors', semi-professional peasant physicians, assist with simple cures, treatment and the distribution of contraceptives. There were 2,020,000 hospital beds in 1981. Large factories and other enterprises provide social services for their employees. Industrial wage-earners qualify for pensions.

Education

The education system expanded rapidly after 1949. Higher education only is free of charge. Much importance is attached to kindergartens. Primary education begins for most children at seven years of age and lasts for five years. Secondary education usually begins at 12 years of age and also lasts five years. During the Cultural Revolution PLA-worker teams took control of schools and universities, and selection for admission was based on political assessment. After 1977 there was a return to conventional standards, with the reintroduction of entrance examinations. As a proportion of the total school-age population, enrolment at primary and secondary schools declined from 95% in 1978 to 83% in 1981. In 1983 China still had 235m. adult illiterates or semi-literates, representing just over 23% of the population. In 1983 some 136m. pupils attended primary schools, while 44m. were at middle schools and 1,207,000 received higher education.

Tourism

Tourism is developing rapidly. Tours are organized for groups of visitors, and Western-style hotels exist in Beijing, Shanghai, Guangzhou and elsewhere. In 1983 9.5m. foreigners and overseas Chinese tourists visited China, raising 1,860m. yuan in foreign exchange.

Public Holidays

1985: 1 May (Labour Day), 1 August (Army Day), 1, 2 October (National Days).

1986: January/February* (Lunar New Year), 8 March (International Women's Day).

* From the first to the third day of the first moon of the lunar calendar.

Weights and Measures

The metric system is officially in force, but some traditional Chinese units are still used.

100 fen = 10 jiao = 1 yuan.

Exchange rates (31 December 1984):

PEOPLE'S COURTS

Supreme People's Court: Beijing; f. 1949; the highest judicial organ of the state; directs and supervises work of lower courts; Pres. ZHENG TIANXIANG (term of office four years).

Special People's Courts.

PEOPLE'S PROCURATORATES

Supreme People's Procuratorate: Beijing; acts for the National People's Congress in examining govt depts, civil servants and citizens, to ensure observance of the law; prosecutes in criminal cases. Procurator-Gen. YANG YICHEN (elected by the National People's Congress for four years).

Ensure that the judicial activities of the people's courts, the execution of sentences in criminal cases, and the activities of departments in charge of reform through labour, conform to the law; institute, or intervene in, important civil cases which affect the interest of the state and the people.

Religion

During the Cultural Revolution places of worship were closed. After 1977 the Government adopted a policy of religious tolerance, and the 1982 Constitution states that citizens enjoy freedom of religious belief, and that legitimate religious activities are protected. Many churches, temples and mosques are reopening.

ANCESTOR WORSHIP

Ancestor worship is believed to have originated with the deification and worship of all important natural phenomena. The divine and human were not clearly defined; all the dead became gods and were worshipped by their descendants. The practice has no code or dogma and the ritual is limited to sacrifices made during festivals and on birth and death anniversaries.

BUDDHISM

Buddhism was introduced into China from India in AD 61, and flourished during the Sui and Tang dynasties (6th–8th century) when eight sects were established. It now bears little resemblance to the religion in its original form, a number of native Chinese legends, traditions, rites and deities having been added. The Chan and Pure Land sects are the most popular.

CONFUCIANISM

Confucianism is a philosophy and a system of ethics, without ritual or priesthood. The respects accorded Confucius are not paid to a prophet or god, but to a great sage whose teachings promote peace and good order in society and whose philosophy encourages moral living.

DAOISM

Daoism originated as a philosophy expounded by Lao Zi, born 604 BC. The establishment of a religion was contrary to his doctrines, but seven centuries after his death his teachings were embodied into a ritual.

CHINA (TAIWAN)

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of China has, since 1949, been confined mainly to the province of Taiwan (comprising one large island and several much smaller ones), which lies off the south-east coast of the Chinese mainland. The territory under the Republic's effective jurisdiction consists of the island of Taiwan (also known as Formosa) and nearby islands, including the P'enghu (Pescadores) group, together with a few other islands which lie just off the mainland and form part of the province of Fujian (Fukien), west of Taiwan. The largest of these is Chinmen (Jinmen), also known as Quemoy, which (with three smaller islands) is about 10 km from the port of Xiamen (Amoy), while five other islands under Taiwan's control, mainly Matsu (Mazu), lie further north, near Fuzhou. Taiwan itself is separated from the mainland by the Taiwan (Formosa) Strait, which is about 145 km (90 miles) wide at its narrowest point. The island's climate is one of rainy summers and mild winters. Average temperatures are about 15°C (59°F) in the winter and 26°C (79°F) in the summer. The average annual rainfall is 2,565 mm (101 in). The official language is Northern Chinese (Mandarin). The predominant religion is Buddhism but there are also Muslims, Daoists, Roman Catholics and Protestants. The philosophy of Confucianism has a large following. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) is red, with a dark blue rectangular canton, containing a white sun, in the upper hoist. The capital of Taiwan is Taipei.

Recent History

China ceded Taiwan to Japan in 1895. The island remained under Japanese rule until 1945, when the Second World War ended. As a result of Japan's defeat in the war, Taiwan was returned to Chinese control, becoming a province of the Republic of China, then ruled by the Kuomintang (Nationalist Party). The leader of the Kuomintang was Gen. Chiang Kai-shek, President of the Republic since 1928.

The Kuomintang government's forces were defeated in 1949 by the Communist revolution in China. President Chiang and many of his supporters withdrew from the Chinese mainland and established themselves on Taiwan, where they set up a Kuomintang regime in succession to their previous all-China administration. This regime continued to assert that it was the rightful Chinese Government, in opposition to the People's Republic of China, which had been proclaimed by the victorious Communists in 1949. Since establishing their base in Taiwan, the Nationalists have successfully resisted attacks by their Communist rivals and have, in turn, declared that they intend to recover control of mainland China from the Communists.

Although its effective control was limited to Taiwan, the Kuomintang regime continued to be dominated by politicians who had formerly been in power on the mainland. In support of the regime's claim to be the legitimate government of all China, Taiwan's legislative bodies are filled mainly by surviving mainland members, and the representatives of the island's native Taiwanese majority occupy only a minority of seats. Unable to replenish their mainland representation, the National Assembly (last elected fully in 1947) and other organs extended their terms of office indefinitely, although fewer than half of the original members were alive on Taiwan in the 1980s. While it has promised eventually to reconquer the mainland, the Kuomintang regime has been largely preoccupied with ensuring its own survival, and promoting economic development, on Taiwan. The political domination of the island by immigrants from the mainland has caused some resentment among Taiwanese, and has led to demands for increased democratization and for the recognition of Taiwan as a state independent of China.

In 1954 the USA, which had refused to recognize the People's Republic of China, signed a mutual security treaty with the Kuomintang Government, pledging to protect Taiwan and the Pescadores. In 1955 the islands of Quemoy and Matsu, lying just offshore from the mainland, were included in the protected area.

In spite of being confined to Taiwan, the Kuomintang regime continued to represent China at the United Nations (and as a permanent member of the UN Security Council) until 1971, when it was replaced by the People's Republic. Nationalist China was subsequently expelled from several other international organizations. In 1984 the Taiwan regime was recognized by only 23 countries.

Legislative elections were held in December 1972, for the first time in 24 years, to fill 53 seats in the National Assembly. The new members, elected for a fixed term of six years, joined 1,376 surviving 'life-term' members of Assembly. In 1973 the Government rejected an offer from the People's Republic to hold secret talks on the reunification of China, and this policy has since been strongly reaffirmed. In October 1981 Taiwan rejected China's suggested terms for reunification, under which Taiwan would become a 'special administrative region' and would have a high degree of autonomy, including the retention of its own armed forces and its relatively high standard of living. In 1983 China renewed its offer of autonomy for Taiwan, including a guarantee to maintain the status quo in Taiwan for 100 years if the province agreed to reunification. In 1984, following the agreement between the People's Republic of China and the United Kingdom that China would regain sovereignty over the British colony of Hong Kong after 1997, Chinese leaders urged Taiwan to accept similar proposals for reunification on the basis of 'one country—two systems'. The Taipei Government, however, insisted that Taiwan would never negotiate with Beijing until the mainland regime renounced communism.

President Chiang Kai-shek remained in office until his death in April 1975. He was succeeded as leader of the ruling Kuomintang by his son, Gen. Chiang Ching-kuo, who had been Prime Minister since May 1972. The new President was Dr Yen Chia-kan, Vice-President since 1966. In May 1978 President Yen retired and was succeeded by Gen. Chiang, who appointed Sun Yun-suan, hitherto Minister of Economic Affairs, to be Prime Minister. Economic and political stability continued to be the regime's main priority. Legislative elections, postponed from December 1978, were held in December 1980. At elections for the Legislative Yuan in December 1983, the Kuomintang won an overwhelming victory, confirming its dominance over the independent 'Tangwai' (non-party) candidates. In March 1984 President Chiang was re-elected for a second six-year term, and Lee Teng-hui, a former Mayor of Taipei and a native Taiwanese, became Vice-President. In May a major government reshuffle took place, and Yu Kuo-hwa, formerly the Governor of the Central Bank, replaced Sun Yun-suan as Prime Minister.

In January 1979 Taiwan suffered a serious setback when the USA established full diplomatic relations with the People's Republic and severed relations with Taiwan. The USA also terminated the mutual security treaty with Taiwan. Commercial links are still maintained, however, under the terms of the USA's Taiwan Relations Act of March 1979. Taiwan's purchase of armaments from the USA has remained a controversial issue and has caused increased tension with mainland China. In August 1982 Taiwan's morale was further damaged when a joint Sino-US communiqué was published, in which the USA pledged to reduce gradually its sale of armaments to Taiwan. Despite this, substantial sales of weapons have continued. In April 1984 the US President, Ronald Reagan, gave an assurance that he would continue to support Taiwan, despite the improved relations between the USA and the People's Republic, which had provoked uncertainty in Taiwan.

Government

The Head of State is the President, who is elected for a term of six years by the National Assembly. There are five Yuans (governing bodies), the highest legislative organ being the Legislative Yuan, to which the Executive Yuan (the Council of Ministers) is responsible. In July 1984 the Legislative Yuan comprised 364 (mainly life) members. Elections for supplementary seats are held every three years. There are also Control, Judicial and Examination Yuans. The Legislative Yuan submits proposals to the National Assembly. Elections to the Assembly are by universal adult suffrage, but the great majority of Assembly seats are held by life members who formerly represented mainland constituencies. In February 1984 the Assembly had 1,067 members.

Defence

In July 1984 the armed forces totalled 484,000 men: army 330,000, air force 77,000, navy 38,000, with a marine corps of 39,000. Military service lasts for two years. Defence expenditure for 1983/84 was estimated at NT $135,900m.

Economic Affairs

Despite the strain of maintaining large armed forces, Taiwan's economy has developed rapidly since 1950, owing mainly to the considerable expansion of foreign trade. By the 1980s, Taiwan was among the world's 20 leading exporting countries (ranking 17th in terms of total foreign trade turnover in 1983). Agriculture's role in the economy has declined significantly since the 1950s; in 1952 it provided more than 90% of total exports and contributed 56.1% of GDP, while employing 56% of the labour force. The principal crops were rice, sugar cane and sweet potatoes. By 1980, however, agricultural products provided less than 10% of total exports; in 1983 the sector contributed only 7.2% of GDP, and employed 18.6% of the labour force.

Between 1970 and 1980, Taiwan's economy grew by about 10% per year, progressing towards self-sufficiency, as the industrial infrastructure developed. Textiles were the main source of income, providing 32% of export earnings in 1970, but recently this proportion has declined, as rising labour costs have encouraged the development of more capital- and technology-intensive industries, such as the manufacture of electronic equipment and plastic products. Other major exports include machinery and metals (following massive investment in heavy industry), plywood and furniture, and petrochemicals. Taiwan has a 65% share of the world market in shipbreaking, centred on the port of Kaohsiung. Despite Taiwan's diplomatic isolation, trade and economic links with the rest of the world have thrived. Exports are still dominated by the US market, which accounts for one-third of Taiwan's foreign trade, followed by Japan, but efforts are being made to expand and diversify export markets in Europe, Africa and South-East Asia.

Mineral resources include coal, marble, gold, petroleum and natural gas. Taiwan's petrochemical industry is the third largest in Asia. Energy supplies have always been a problem, and Taiwan is heavily dependent on imported petroleum. There are three nuclear power plants in operation, providing around 37% of Taiwan's total power generation, and additional plants are planned.

Following the recession in world markets, Taiwan's GDP grew by only 3% in 1982, well below the target growth rate of 7.5%. In 1983, however, following an export-led recovery, GDP grew by 7%. Exports increased by 13.1%, while imports increased by 7.4%, and the trade surplus increased from US $2,843m. in 1982 to $4,830m. in 1983. The economic recovery was expected to continue in 1984, with GNP growth predicted at 9% or more. The unemployment rate was about 2% in 1983, while the inflation rate averaged 3.5%. Taiwan's GNP per head was more than US $2,500 in 1982. The 1982–85 Four-Year Plan, which envisaged an average annual growth rate of 8%, aimed to increase investment, to stimulate trade and to develop industry. There are plans to develop Taiwan's role as an offshore banking centre, with increased financial services, while a free trade zone, to attract foreign investment, is to be established. The first offshore banking licences were granted in May 1984, as the first step towards an eventual liberalization of Taiwan's foreign exchange controls.

Transport and Communications

There are 3,036.7 km of railway and 17,600 km of roads. The ports of Keelung, Hualien, Kaohsiung, Taichung and Suao handled 122.5m. metric tons of cargo in 1982. There are international airports at Taipei and Kaohsiung. Construction of a subway system began in Taipei in July 1983.

Social Welfare

The Labour Security Programme covers around 3.3m. workers and provides benefits for injury, disability, birth, death and old age. In June 1984, 467,000 government employees were covered by a separate scheme. In 1978 a system of supplementary benefits for those with low incomes was introduced. In 1983 Taiwan had 11,976 hospital establishments, with a total of 57,419 beds, and there were 14,669 physicians (including Chinese herb doctors) working in the country.

Education

Education at primary schools and junior high schools is free and compulsory between the ages of six and 15 years. Secondary schools consist of junior and senior middle schools, normal schools for teacher-training and vocational schools. There are also a number of private schools. Higher education is provided in universities, colleges, junior colleges and graduate schools. In 1982/83 there were more than 2.2m. pupils enrolled in state primary schools, with about 1.6m. in secondary schools. There are 16 universities and 11 independent colleges.

Tourism

Festivals, ancient art treasures and the island scenery are the principal attractions. In 1983 Taiwan received 1,457,404 foreign visitors. Japanese visitors account for about 40% of total tourist arrivals.

Public Holidays

1985: 22 June (Dragon Boat Festival), 28 September (Teachers' Day—Birthday of Confucius), 30 September (Mid-Autumn Moon Festival), 10 October (Double Tenth Day, anniversary of 1911 revolution), 25 October (Retrocession Day, anniversary of end of Japanese occupation), 31 October (Birthday of Chiang Kai-shek), 12 November (Birthday of Sun Yat-sen), 25 December (Constitution Day).

The Constitution

On 1 January 1947 a new Constitution was promulgated for the Republic of China (confined to Taiwan since 1949). The form of government that was incorporated in the Constitution is based on a five-power system and has the major features of both cabinet and presidential government. The following are the principal organs of government:

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

The Assembly, composed of elected delegates, meets to elect or recall the President and Vice-President, to amend the Constitution, or to vote on proposed constitutional amendments that have been submitted by the Legislative Yuan. Since the overthrow of the Republic of China on the mainland, most of the seats are held by 'life-term' members, originally elected to represent mainland constituencies.

PRESIDENT

Elected by the National Assembly for a term of six years, and may be re-elected for a second term (the two-term restriction is at present suspended). Represents country at all state functions, including foreign relations; commands land, sea and air forces, promulgates laws, issues mandates, concludes treaties, declares war, makes peace, declares martial law, grants amnesties, appoints and removes civil and military officers, and confers honours and decorations. He also convenes the National Assembly, and subject to certain limitations, may issue emergency orders to deal with national calamities and ensure national security.

EXECUTIVE YUAN

Is the highest administrative organ of the nation and is responsible to the Legislative Yuan; has five categories of subordinate organization:

Executive Yuan Council
Ministries and Commissions
Secretariat
Government Information Office and Personnel Administration Bureau
Directorate-General of Budget, Accounting and Statistics.

LEGISLATIVE YUAN

Is the highest legislative organ of the state, composed of elected members; holds two sessions a year; is empowered to hear administrative reports of the Executive Yuan, and to change government policy. Like the National Assembly, most of its seats are held by 'life-term' members.

JUDICIAL YUAN

Is the highest judicial organ of state and has charge of civil, criminal and administrative cases, and of cases concerning disciplinary measures against public functionaries (see Judicial System).

EXAMINATION YUAN

Supervises examinations for entry into public offices, and deals with personal questions of the civil service.

CONTROL YUAN

Is a body elected by local councils to impeach or investigate the work of the Executive Yuan and the Ministries and Executives; meets once a month, and has a subordinate body, the Ministry of Audit.

COLOMBIA

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Colombia lies in the north-west of South America, with the Caribbean Sea to the north and the Pacific Ocean to the west. Its continental neighbours are Venezuela and Brazil to the east, and Peru and Ecuador to the south, while Panama connects it with Central America. The coastal areas have a tropical rain forest climate, the plateaux are temperate, and in the Andes mountains there are areas of permanent snow. The language is Spanish. Almost all of the inhabitants profess Christianity, and about 95% are Roman Catholics. There are small Protestant and Jewish minorities. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) has three horizontal stripes, of yellow (one-half of the depth), dark blue and red. The capital is Bogotá.

Recent History

Colombia was under Spanish rule from the 16th century until 1819, when it achieved independence as part of Gran Colombia, which included Ecuador, Panama and Venezuela. Ecuador and Venezuela seceded in 1830, when Colombia (then including Panama) became a separate republic. In 1903 the province of Panama successfully rebelled and became an independent country.

For more than a century, Colombia has been dominated by two political parties, the Conservatives (Partido Conservador) and the Liberals (Partido Liberal), whose rivalry has often led to violence. Liberal governments held power in 1860–84 and 1930–46, with Conservative governments in 1884–1930 and 1946–53. From 1922 to 1953, with one exception, every President of Colombia completed his four-year term of office. The assassination in April 1948 of Bogotá's left-wing Liberal mayor, Jorge Eliécer Gaitán, led to intense political violence, amounting to civil war, between Conservative and Liberal factions. According to official estimates, lawlessness between 1949 and 1958, known as 'La Violencia', caused the deaths of about 280,000 people.

President Laureano Gómez, who had been elected 'unopposed' in November 1949, ruled as a dictator until his overthrow by a coup in June 1953, when power was seized by Gen. Gustavo Rojas Pinilla. President Rojas established a right-wing dictatorship but, following widespread rioting, he was deposed in May 1957, when a five-man military junta took power.

In an attempt to restore peace and stability, the Conservative and Liberal Parties agreed to co-operate in a National Front. Under this arrangement, the presidency was to be held by Liberals and Conservatives in rotation, while Cabinet portfolios would be divided equally between the two parties and both would have an equal number of seats in each house of the bicameral Congress. In December 1957, in Colombia's first vote on the basis of universal adult suffrage, this agreement was overwhelmingly approved by a referendum. It was subsequently incorporated in Colombia's constitution.

In May 1958 the first presidential election under the amended constitution was won by the National Front candidate, Dr Alberto Lleras Camargo, a Liberal who had been President in 1945–46. He took office in August 1958, when the junta relinquished power. During the rule of President Lleras Camargo, who was in power until 1962, left-wing guerrilla groups were established in Colombia. As provided by the 1957 agreement, he was succeeded by a Conservative, Dr Guillermo León Valencia, who held office until 1966, when another Liberal, Dr Carlos Lleras Restrepo, was elected. Despite continuing political violence, President Lleras Restrepo was able to bring about some recovery in Colombia's economy. In the presidential election of 1970, the National Front candidate, Dr Misael Pastrana Borrero of the Conservative Party, narrowly defeated Gen. Rojas, the former dictator, who campaigned as leader of the Alianza Nacional Popular (ANAPO). At elections to Congress, held simultaneously, the National Front lost its majority in both houses.

The bipartisan form of government ended formally with the presidential and legislative elections of April 1974, although the 1974–78 Cabinet remained subject to the parity agreement. The Conservative and Liberal Parties together won an overwhelming majority of seats in Congress, and the vote for ANAPO was greatly reduced. The presidential election was won by the Liberal Party candidate, Dr Alfonso López Michelsen, who gained 56% of the votes. President López promised wide-ranging reforms and a more equitable distribution of income. His failure to achieve these aims led to strikes, rioting and increased guerrilla violence, and a state of siege was announced in June 1975.

At elections to Congress in February 1978, the Liberal Party won a clear majority in both houses, and in June the Liberal Party candidate, Dr Julio César Turbay Ayala, won the presidential election. President Turbay kept to the National Front agreement, and attempted to tackle the problems of urban terrorism and drug trafficking, but had little success. In October 1981 a Peace Commission was set up under ex-President Lleras Restrepo. In early 1982 the guerrillas suffered heavy losses after successful counter-insurgency operations, combined with the activities of a new anti-guerrilla group which was associated with drug-smuggling enterprises, the Muerte a Secuestradores (MAS, Death to Kidnappers), whose targets later became trade union leaders and human rights activists. In April the majority of the Peace Commission resigned when the Government opposed the granting of a total amnesty, although the state of siege was lifted in June.

At congressional elections in March 1982, the Liberal Party maintained its majority in both the House of Representatives and the Senate. In the presidential election in May, the Conservative candidate, Dr Belisario Betancur Cuartas, received the most votes, owing to a division within the Liberal Party between the unpopular ex-President López, the 'official' candidate (whose career has been chequered by corruption charges), and a young Senator, Dr Luis Carlos Galán Sarmiento, who was the leader of the party's radical faction (Nuevo Liberalismo) and a protégé of ex-President Lleras Restrepo.

President Betancur, who took office in August 1982, declared a broad amnesty to the guerrillas in November, reconvened the Peace Commission and ordered an investigation into the MAS. Several hundred political prisoners were released. He embarked on a programme which was more radical than that of the Liberals, involving increased expenditure on education, health and housing, the elimination of crime and corruption, and greater control of the country's large financial conglomerates. The internal pacification programme, which was begun in November 1982, met with only moderate success. An estimated 2,000 guerrillas accepted the Government's offer of amnesty. The death squads of the MAS group were increasingly active, and in 1983 a further wave of kidnapping took place, during which the President's brother was abducted. In October 1983 President Betancur met with the leaders of the M-19 left-wing guerrilla group in Madrid, and in November the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia (FARC) sought a cease-fire with effect from January 1984, and revealed plans to become a political party.

President Betancur encountered opposition from the army, which was angered by government attempts to put on trial officers who were suspected of collaborating with the MAS, and from the judiciary, which declared the state of economic emergency to be unconstitutional. The Government was reshuffled in August 1983. The Plan Cuatrienal de Paz, launched in 1983, provided US $800m. for revitalization of the economy, further social reform, and the consolidation of economic development, with specific reference to the regions affected by guerrilla activity. In January 1984, following a dispute over whether to deal with the guerrillas by force or negotiation, President Betancur warned the armed forces not to intervene in politics, as a result of which the Defence Minister and the army and air force commanders resigned.

In February 1984 President Betancur announced the resumption of talks between the Peace Commission and the principal guerrilla organizations. Hopes of an early settlement were temporarily dashed when, in March, the Government declared a state of siege throughout four departments, following an attack on the town of Florencia by members of the M-19 group. In late March, however, the Peace Commission and the FARC agreed conditions for a cease-fire, which was to take effect for one year from May. Under the terms of the accord, the Government agreed to the demilitarization of rural areas. The FARC was to be allowed to assume an active political role. In July, following protracted negotiations, the M-19 group and the Ejército Popular de Liberación (EPL) agreed to a cease-fire but refused to relinquish their weapons. In spite of the murder of the M-19's founder, Carlos Toledo Plata, and subsequent reprisals by those guerrillas still active, including an attack on the town of Yumbo in western Colombia, the peace accord was signed in August. Factions of the FARC, EPL and the M-19 group which were opposed to the truce continued to fight against the Government. It was believed that some members of the armed forces were still reluctant to co-operate with the guerrillas, and scepticism was expressed over the Government's ability to maintain the cease-fire.

A major setback to the Government's campaign for internal peace occurred in May 1984, when the Minister of Justice, Rodrigo Lara Bonilla, was assassinated. His murder was regarded as a consequence of his energetic efforts to eradicate the flourishing drugs industry, and Colombia's leading drugs dealers were implicated in the killing. The Government immediately declared a nation-wide state of siege and announced its intention to adopt severe measures against the dealers, including the enforcement of its hitherto unobserved extradition treaty with the USA.

At departmental and municipal elections in March, the Partido Liberal secured a majority over the ruling Partido Conservador, winning approximately 56% of the votes cast. In June the resignation of the Minister of Foreign Affairs prompted a Cabinet reshuffle.

The long-standing border dispute with Venezuela has yet to be resolved, and in 1980 Nicaragua laid claim to the Colombian-controlled islands of Providencia and San Andrés. Colombia has a territorial dispute with Honduras over cays in the San Andrés and Providencia archipelago. Relations with Argentina were strained following the Falklands War, but rumours of the existence of a US military base on San Andrés were denied by the Colombian Government, which announced allegiance to the Non-Aligned Movement in late 1982. The visit to Bogotá in December 1982 by President Ronald Reagan of the USA failed to secure Colombian support for US policy in Central America. President Betancur's efforts to reverse Colombian foreign policy led to improved relations with Nicaragua and Cuba, and an attempt to revive the Andean Pact. As a member of the Contadora group, Colombia sought a new peace initiative for Central America and supported the withdrawal of US forces from El Salvador and Honduras.

Government

Executive power is exercised by the President (assisted by a Cabinet), who is elected for a four-year term by universal adult suffrage. Legislation is carried out by Congress, consisting of the Senate (112 members elected for four years) and the House of Representatives (199 members elected for four years). The country is divided into 23 Departments, four Intendencies and three Commissaries.

Defence

At 18 years of age, every male (with the exception of students) must present himself as a candidate for two years' military service. In July 1984 the strength of the army was 57,000, the navy 8,500 (including 2,500 marines) and the air force 4,200. The paramilitary police force numbers about 50,000 men. Defence expenditure for 1983 was 35,940m. pesos.

Economic Affairs

The economy depends principally on coffee, of which Colombia is the world's second largest producer, with a 16% share of the world market. Production rose from 8m. bags (each of 60 kg) in 1974/75 to 13.3m. bags in 1980/81. Exports, however, declined to 9m. bags in 1981/82 as a result of falling demand. In the first nine months of 1983, sales of coffee accounted for 54% of export income. The major problems facing the industry in 1983 were over-production and the appearance of coffee rust fungus in Colombia. Heavy rains and disease were expected to reduce the 1984 harvest by up to 50%. Other important cash crops are cotton, bananas, sugar cane, tobacco, cocoa and cut flowers. The principal food crops are rice, sorghum, maize, wheat and barley. Agricultural output accounts for about 22% of Colombia's GDP, but in the years 1977–80 the increase in agricultural production was outstripped by the rise in domestic demand. In 1980 food imports reached record levels, while production grew by only 1.3%. In 1983 the agricultural sector was estimated to have grown by only 1%. Under the national development plan (1983–86), agriculture received an allocation of $1,170m. It was anticipated that production would increase by 4% per annum, and exports by 10%. The illegal trade in Colombian hemp (marijuana) and cocaine is increasing, and it is believed that contraband exports of these drugs could now exceed the value of legal exports.

Manufacturing accounts for over 20% of the GDP, and prominent industries are food processing, textiles, chemicals, metal products and transport equipment. By 1981, when production fell by 1% after an increase of 2.6% in 1980, the sector was suffering from loss of competitiveness abroad, and industrialists were seeking import tariffs. In 1983 the Government introduced exchange and import controls, which required more than 80% of imports to hold prior licences. In September a ban on the import of motor cars was imposed. Industrial production fell by over 2.5% in 1983. Under the 1983–86 development plan, $21,400m. is to be invested in 100 projects, including the development of electric energy, mining, transport and industry. The rapidly-developing construction industry which accounts for almost 4% of GDP, received an allocation of US $2,900m. to provide 400,000 additional housing units and to generate 300,000 more jobs. In March 1982 the World Bank made a loan of $359m. (the largest ever in Latin America) for the Guavio hydroelectric project (capacity 1,600 MW), to be completed in 1986. A further loan of US $70m. from the IDB has been used to construct the San Carlos hydroelectric plant (capacity 620,000 kW), near Medellín. There are plans to construct five small hydro plants with an initial installed capacity of 16,100 kW. The country's estimated potential is 60,985 MW. Hydroelectricity provided 70% of energy needs in 1983, compared with 17% in 1960. Production of crude petroleum fell from 219,043 b/d in 1970 to 123,836 in 1979 but rose to 145,000 b/d in 1983, reducing imports to 50,000 b/d. Production was expected to reach 173,000 b/d in 1984. Following significant discoveries in Arauca, northern Colombia, and Vichada, reserves were estimated to be in excess of 1,000m. barrels. Joint projects with foreign companies were expected to produce sufficient petroleum for both domestic consumption and export by 1986. Production of natural gas exceeds local needs. Known gas reserves total 4,716,000m. cubic feet. The Guajira field came 'on stream' in 1977. The gas will supply power for the proposed Palomino petro-chemical complex.

Colombia possessed 40% of Latin America's proven reserves of coal in 1982. Total proven reserves are 1,267m. metric tons and potential reserves may be five times as great. Colombia aims to supply 10% of the world market by 1999. The richest field is at El Cerrejón (with estimated reserves of 1,600m. metric tons), for which Exxon undertook a US $3,200m. development contract in 1980. Production began in 1984 and was hoped to yield 15m. metric tons per year by 1999. Export of coal was expected to reach 5m. tons in 1985 and 27m. tons after 1990. Further developments are taking place at La Loma and La Jagua. The Cerro Matoso nickel plant, costing $400m., was inaugurated in June 1982 and was expected to produce 22,600 metric tons for export annually. Proven reserves are 25m. tons, while total reserves are estimated to be 70m. tons. Colombia produces 95% of the world's emeralds. Gold, silver, platinum, lead, zinc, copper, mercury, limestone and phosphates are also mined, and there are substantial reserves of uranium.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, Colombia's economic development was more promising than in most Latin American countries, with the annual GDP growth rate averaging 6.2% between 1966 and 1976. By 1981 the growth rate had fallen to 2.1% (from 5.4% in 1979), and by 1983 it had fallen to 1.5%. The Government continued to borrow from abroad in order to maintain economic growth, and this contributed towards high interest rates and an inflation rate of 16.8% at the end of 1983, although Colombia continued to have a low rate of indebtedness compared with the rest of Latin America. In 1983 Colombia remained the only Latin American country which was capable of raising syndicated loans on the international markets without difficulty, and in October Colombia secured a loan of US $210m. from a 21-bank syndicate. Colombia has received authorization from the World Bank to borrow a further $9,600m. between 1983 and 1986 at a rate of $2,000m. per year. Although export earnings began to fall in 1981, the long-term outlook was encouraging because of developments in the mining industry, which is expected to overtake coffee in importance by the end of the decade.

In 1984 Colombia's economy was severely affected by the decline in domestic demand and the recession among its neighbours. The sharp drop in exports in 1982–83, coupled with the considerable flight of capital, resulted in a significant decline in reserves of foreign exchange, which fell from $3,489m. in December 1982 to $774m. in September 1984. Unemployment rose to 13.6% in June 1984. In addition, the banking sector was severely affected by the financial difficulties of several major private concerns and by its involvement with Colombia's parallel economy, centred on the drugs industry. In response to the mounting economic problems, the Government adopted a programme of austerity measures, which included strict import restrictions applied to 80% of imports, an exchange rate programme of progressive currency devaluations, and improved tax collection. In 1985 Colombia intended to borrow $2,000m. from commercial banks in order to avoid rescheduling its foreign debt of $11,000m.

Colombia is a member of ALADI (see p. 171) and the Andean Pact (p. 95), and became a party to GATT (p. 63) in May 1981.

Transport and Communications

The high mountains make land transport difficult, so the principal means of long-distance transport is by air. There are more than 100 airports, including six international airports. There were 74,735 km of roads in 1980 and 3,403 km of railways in 1984. There are plans to construct a new Jungle Edge highway to provide direct access to the interior. Major road projects are the Bogotá–Medellín highway, the final stretch of the Pan-American highway, near the Panamanian border, and the reconstruction of the Turbo–Medellín highway. Under the 1983 Plan, funds have been secured for the construction of 288 km of the Caribbean highway, in addition to 559 km of other new roads. A further 500 km of secondary and access roads will also be built. As a result of the development of the El Cerrejón coal field, Colombia's first deep-water port has been constructed at Bahía de Portete, and a 150-km rail link between El Cerrejón and the port is due to become operational in 1986. Much freight and cattle, as well as passenger traffic, is carried on the River Magdalena.

Social Welfare

There is compulsory social security paid for by the Government, employers and employees, and administered by the Institute of Social Security. It provides benefits for disability, old age, death, sickness, maternity, industrial accidents and unemployment. Large firms must provide life insurance for their employees and there is a comprehensive system of pensions. In 1978 there were 809 hospitals and clinics, with 43,098 beds. The benefits of the health service do not reach all inhabitants, and a report issued by the Family Welfare Institute in 1981 put the level of infant mortality at 64 per 1,000 live births, one of the highest rates in the world.

Education

Education commences at nursery level for children under six years of age. Primary education is free and compulsory for five years. No child may be admitted to secondary school unless these five years have been successfully completed. Secondary education is for four years. Following completion of this period, there are four terms of vocational study, leading to the Bachiller examination. In 1981 the total enrolment at primary and secondary schools was equivalent to 85% of children aged six to 16. In 1983 there were an estimated 216 institutions of higher education. There are plans to construct an Open University to meet the increasing demand for higher education. Adult illiteracy declined from 19.2% in 1973 to an estimated 12.4% in 1980.

Tourism

The principal tourist attractions are the Caribbean coast (including the island of San Andrés), the 16th-century walled city of Cartagena, the Amazonian town of Leticia, the Andes mountains of up to 5,700 m above sea-level, the extensive forests and jungles and pre-Columbian relics and monuments of colonial art. Since 1978 tourism has been the second biggest foreign exchange earner. Most of the 1,083,437 visitors in 1982 came from Venezuela, Ecuador, Europe and the USA.

Public Holidays

1985: 1 May (Labour Day), 16 May (Ascension), 6 June (Corpus Christi), 29 June (SS. Peter and Paul), 20 July (Independence), 7 August (Battle of Boyacá), 15 August (Assumption), 12 October (Discovery of America), 1 November (All Saints' Day), 11 November (Independence of Cartagena), 8 December (Immaculate Conception), 25 December (Christmas Day).

Weights and Measures

The metric system is in force.

* Data are tabulated by year of registration rather than by year of occurrence. Figures for births in 1970–73 and (except for Bogotá) marriages are based on baptisms and marriages recorded in Roman Catholic church registers. Figures for births after 1973 refer to births registered in the same year. Figures for deaths are based on burial permits. Registration is incomplete and the UN estimates average annual rates as: births 33.3 per 1,000 in 1970–75, 32.1 per 1,000 in 1975–80; deaths 9.0 per 1,000 in 1970–75, 8.2 per 1,000 in 1975–80.

The Constitution

The Constitution which is now in force was promulgated in 1886 and has been amended from time to time. In 1957 it was amended to provide for the alternation of the presidency between the two major parties. All citizens over 18 years of age are eligible to vote. Civil rights and social guarantees include freedom of education, the right to strike (except in the public sector), public aid to those unable to support themselves, freedom of assembly, of the press, and the right to petition. All male citizens are required to present themselves for possible military service at the age of 18.

THE PRESIDENT

Executive power is vested in the President of the Republic, who is elected by popular suffrage for a four-year term of office. The President cannot hold office for two consecutive terms but may be re-elected at a later date.

The President is assisted in the government of the country by a Cabinet which he appoints. A substitute (primer designado) is elected by Congress, subject to biannual reappointment, to act in the event of a Presidential vacancy. The President appoints the governors of the twenty-four departments, the three intendencies and the three commissaries.

CONGRESS

Legislative power is exercised by Congress, which is composed of the Senate and the House of Representatives. Members of both chambers are elected by direct suffrage for a period of four years. The President in each House is elected for six months.

JUDICIARY

The administration of justice is in the hands of the Supreme Court, superior district tribunals, and lower courts. The magistrates of the Supreme Court of Justice are elected by Congress from lists presented by the President. The term of office is five years and the magistrates may be re-elected indefinitely.

NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL

Direction of the nation's finances is in the hands of the Controller-General who is appointed for two years. A National Economic Council including five ministers and also representatives of banking, industrial and agricultural interests, has functioned since 1935.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

For administrative purposes the country is divided into 24 departments, three intendencies and three commissaries. The departments are further divided into municipalities. Governors for the departments are appointed by the President, but regional legislatures are elected by the local inhabitants and enjoy considerable autonomy, including the management of local finances. Mayors for the municipalities are appointed by the governors.

AMENDMENTS

Various constitutional reforms were promulgated in December 1968, including the following amendments: to increase the membership of the Senate from 106 to 112, and the maximum membership of the House of Representatives from 204 to 214; to increase from two to four years the term of office of representatives; to eliminate the two-thirds majority required for matters of importance; to enable the Government to legislate by decree for a maximum period of 90 days in any one year in the event of an economic crisis, though such decrees must relate only to the matters which caused the crisis; from 1970, proportional representation to be allowed in departmental and municipal elections; the same principle to apply to congressional elections after 1974. An amendment was also promulgated whereby the 'minority' party must have 'adequate' representation in government positions.

Note: A state of siege has been in force intermittently since 1948. It was last declared in October 1976 and lifted in August 1982.

Judicial System

The Supreme Court of Justice is divided into four subsidiary courts of Civil Cassation, Criminal Cassation, Labour Cassation and Constitutional Procedure. The 24 judges of the Supreme Court are elected for life, although they may be removed from office if considered to be unfit by reason of conduct or age. Vacancies are filled from within the Court by election by the members. For matters of great importance and government business, the three courts of the Supreme Court sit together as a Plenary Court.

The country is divided into judicial districts, each of which has a superior court of three or more judges. There are also other Courts of Justice for each judicial district, and judges for each province and municipality.

THE COMOROS*

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Federal Islamic Republic of the Comoros is an archipelago in the Mozambique Channel, between the island of Madagascar and the east coast of the African mainland. The group comprises four main islands (Njazidja, Nzwani and Mwali, formerly Grande-Comore, Anjouan and Mohéli respectively, and Mayotte) and numerous islets and coral reefs. The climate is tropical, with considerable variations in rainfall and temperature from island to island. The official languages are Arabic and French but the majority of the population speak Comoran, a blend of Swahili and Arabic. Islam is the state religion. The flag is green, with a white crescent moon and four five-pointed stars in the centre. The capital is Moroni, on Njazidja.

Recent History

Formerly attached to Madagascar, the Comoros became a separate French Overseas Terrritory in 1947. The islands achieved internal self-government in December 1961, with a Chamber of Deputies and a Government Council to control local administration.

Elections in December 1972 produced a large majority for parties advocating independence, and Ahmed Abdallah became President of the Government Council. In June 1973 he was restyled President of the Government. A referendum in December 1974 resulted in a 96% vote in favour of independence, despite the opposition of the Mayotte Party, seeking the status of a French Department for the island of Mayotte.

On 6 July 1975, after France decided that any constitutional settlement must be ratified by all the islands voting separately, the Chamber of Deputies voted for immediate independence. The Chamber elected Abdallah to be first President of the Comoros and constituted itself as the National Assembly. France made no attempt to intervene but maintained control of Mayotte. President Abdallah was deposed in August, and the Assembly was abolished. A National Executive Council was established, with Prince Said Mohammed Jaffar, leader of the opposition Front National Uni, as its head and Ali Soilih, leader of the coup, among its members. In November the Comoros was admitted to the UN, as a unified state comprising the whole archipelago, but France continued to support Mayotte, although recognizing the independence of the three remaining islands in December. In February 1976 Mayotte voted overwhelmingly to retain its links with France.

As relations with France deteriorated, all development aid and technical assistance were withdrawn. Ali Soilih was elected Head of State in January 1976, and a new constitution gave him extended powers. Many citizens reported political repression.

In May 1978 Soilih was shot dead following a coup by a group of about 50 European mercenaries, led by a Frenchman, Bob Denard, on behalf of the exiled former President, Ahmed Abdallah. A Federal Islamic Republic was proclaimed. In July the Comoros was expelled from the OAU because of the continued presence of the mercenaries.

A new constitution was drawn up and approved by a referendum in October, on the three islands excluding Mayotte, by 99.31% of votes. Abdallah was elected President in the same month, and in December elections were held to form a Federal Assembly. In January 1979 the Assembly approved the formation of a one-party state. Unofficial opposition groups, however, continue to exist, and 150 people were arrested in February 1981 after officially-denied reports of an attempted coup. Ali Mroudjae, former Minister of Foreign Affairs and Co-operation, was appointed Prime Minister in February 1982, and legislative elections were held in March. Constitutional amendments, adopted in October, strengthened the President's power by reducing that of each island's Governor. In May 1983 President Abdallah announced an amnesty for all political prisoners who were serving sentences of less than 10 years. In December a plot to overthrow the Government was discovered. A group of British mercenaries was to have staged a coup on behalf of a former Comoran diplomat, Said Ali Kemal, but the plot was foiled by the arrest of the mercenary leaders in Australia. Abdallah was the sole candidate at a presidential election in September 1984. Despite calls by the opposition for voters to boycott the election, there was a turn-out of 98%. Abdallah's candidacy was endorsed by 99.44% of voters, and he was therefore returned to office for a further six years. In January 1985 the constitution was amended to abolish the position of Prime Minister, and President Abdallah assumed the office of Head of Government. In the same month, Abdallah effected a major ministerial reshuffle, in which the Council of Ministers was considerably enlarged, to include four new Ministers of State.

Diplomatic relations with France were resumed in July 1978, and in November the two countries signed agreements on military and economic co-operation, apparently deferring any decision on the future of Mayotte. The OAU (see p. 188) readmitted the Comoros in February 1979.

Government

According to the Constitution of October 1978 (q.v.), the Comoros is ruled by a President, elected for six years by universal adult suffrage. He is assisted by an appointed Council of Ministers. Legislative power lies with the Federal Assembly, with 38 members directly elected for five years, while each island has a degree of autonomy under a Governor and Council. Constitutional amendments in October 1982 gave the President the power to appoint each Governor, while the Federal Government became responsible for each island's resources.

Defence

The national army, the Forces Armées Comoriennes, has between 700 and 800 men, and there are about 20 French officers.

Economic Affairs

The economy of the Comoros is severely underdeveloped. Apart from a minute industrial sector, which concentrates on the distillation of essences, vanilla processing, soft drinks and woodwork, the population work in primitive agriculture. In 1979 about 87% of the working population were employed in the agricultural sector. Cassava, sweet potatoes, bananas and rice are the main food crops, but more than one-half of the islands' food is imported. Rice imports totalled 2,400m. Comoros francs in 1982 and 2,279m. francs in 1983. Imports were expected to rise sharply in 1984, as the entire domestic crop was reported to have been destroyed by a hurricane. The dominant sector, that of the colonial plantations, is geared exclusively to the cultivation of ylang-ylang, vanilla, cloves and copra for export to a world market in recession, and earnings are quite inadequate to cover the cost of imports. The soil is over-exploited, ill-suited to arable or pasture and, in places, severely eroded. Over-population, high unemployment, poor harvests, landlessness, lack of natural resources, poor communications and the emigration of trained personnel to the Gulf states all add to the country's economic problems. However, the Government is aiming for self-sufficiency in basic foodstuffs, and by 1981 major projects involving maize, coconuts and poultry had also been established. Plans were made to develop stock-breeding and small fishing concerns, although the latter's potential is limited.

* Most of the information contained in this chapter refers to the whole Comoros archipelago, which the independent Comoran state claims as its national territory. However, the island of Mayotte (Mahoré) is, in fact, administered by France. Separate information on Mayotte may be found in the chapter on French Overseas Possessions (p. 1670).

In 1982, according to estimates by the World Bank, the Comoros' gross national product per head (at average 1980–82 prices) was US $340, having increased by an average of only 0.9% annually, in real terms, since 1960.

Until 1975 French aid kept the economy afloat, but no effort to develop a basis for an independent economy was made. When France cut off all aid in July 1975, it left the islands virtually bankrupt. After diplomatic relations were restored in July 1978, aid resumed, and in 1982 totalled 61.2m. French francs. Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates and the EEC also contribute to development projects. The country's first international aid donors' conference, held in July 1984, was attended by 17 countries and 24 aid agencies. The conference considered projects outlined in the 1983–90 Development Plan, and raised US $114.6m. in project finance. Of this, $15.25m. was allocated for the construction of a hydroelectric power plant on Nzwani.

The balance of trade showed a deficit of 3,783m. Comoros francs in 1980, rising to 4,291m. francs in 1982 and to 5,680m. francs in 1983. The budget for 1984 envisaged revenue of 6,507m. francs and expenditure of 7,975m. francs.

Transport and Communications

Transport facilities are very limited, even between the islands themselves, and most inland traffic is carried on by sailing boats. In 1977 there were approximately 750 km (470 miles) of roads, of which 398 km (247 miles) were paved. There are air and sea links with the rest of the world via Madagascar and East Africa. In 1980 work began on 70 km of new roads, and improvement to Moroni-Hahaya airport. In 1983 work started on a project, costing US $45.8m., to extend Mutsamudu port by converting the existing jetty to accommodate vessels of up to 11m. draught. The project was due for completion in April 1985. The Government planned to develop Moroni port as well, and in 1984 was seeking financial aid for the project.

Social Welfare

In 1976 there were two hospitals, five general welfare centres and a number of maternity units. Health personnel totalled 182 in 1978, including 20 physicians and 124 nurses. In 1983 the Government was granted a loan of $2.8m. by the International Development Association for a programme to curb population growth and to improve health facilities on the islands. Two new maternity clinics were planned, and existing health centres were to be renovated.

Education

Education is officially compulsory for eight years betwen seven and 15 years of age. Primary education begins at the age of six and lasts for six years. Secondary education, beginning at 12 years of age, lasts for seven years, comprising a first cycle of four years and a second of three years. Total enrolment at primary and secondary schools, as a proportion of all school-age children, increased from 19% in 1970 to 64% (boys 77%; girls 52%) in 1980. Secondary education ceased after the withdrawal of all French teaching staff in late 1975 but some schools were reopened in 1976 with the aid of teachers from other French-speaking countries. According to a UNICEF study, there are enough Comoran teachers to provide basic education for all children through traditional Koranic schools, which 31,600 pupils were attending in 1978/79. In 1980 there were 59,709 pupils attending primary schools and 13,798 pupils at secondary schools. An education project was launched in 1980, financed by the African Development Fund.

Tourism

There is a developing tourist industry but fewer than 2,000 tourists per year stay in the islands' four hotels. The chief attractions are the beaches, underwater fishing and mountain trips.

Directory

The Constitution

The Constitution of the Federal Islamic Republic of the Comoros was approved by popular referendum on 1 October 1978. Several amendments were made in October 1982 and in January 1985. It is not in effect on the island of Mayotte (q.v.), which it envisages as eventually 'rejoining the Comoran community'.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES

The preamble affirms the will of the Comoran people to derive from the state religion, Islam, inspiration for the regulation of government, to adhere to the principles laid down by the Charters of the UN and the OAU, and to guarantee the rights of citizens in accordance with the UN Declaration of Human Rights. Sovereignty resides in the people, through their elected representatives. All citizens are equal before the law.

ISLAND AND FEDERAL INSTITUTIONS

The Comoros archipelago constitutes a Federal Islamic Republic. Each island has autonomy in matters not assigned by the Constitution to the federal institutions, which comprise the Presidency and Council of Government, the Federal Assembly, and the Supreme Court. There is universal secret suffrage for all citizens over 18 in full possession of their civil and political rights. The number of political parties may be regulated by federal law.

The President of the Republic is Head of State and Head of Government and is elected for six years by direct suffrage, and may not serve for more than two terms. He nominates ministers to form the Council of Government. The Governor of each island is nominated by the President of the Republic for five years, and appoints not more than four Commissioners to whom administration is delegated. Should the Presidency fall vacant, the President of the Supreme Court temporarily assumes the office until a presidential election takes place.

The Federal Assembly is directly elected for five years. Each electoral ward elects one deputy. The Assembly meets for not more than 45 days at a time, in April and October and if necessary in extraordinary sessions. Matters covered by federal legislation include defence, posts and telecommunications, external and inter-island transport, civil, penal and industrial law, external trade, federal taxation, long-term economic planning, education and health.

The Council of each island is directly elected for four years. Each electoral ward elects one councillor. Each Council meets for not more than 15 days at a time, in March and December and if necessary in extraordinary sessions. The Councils are responsible for non-federal legislation.

THE JUDICIARY

The judiciary is independent of the legislative and executive powers. The Supreme Court acts as a Constitutional Council in resolving constitutional questions and supervising presidential elections, and as High Court of Justice it arbitrates in any case where the government is accused of malpractice.

Elections for a Federal Assembly of 38 members were held in March 1982.

President: Mohamed Taki.

Political Organizations

During Ali Soilih's presidency, political parties ceased to play an active role, though still legally in existence. The 1978 Constitution provided for the free activity of political parties, but in January 1979 the Federal Assembly voted for the establishment of a one-party system for the following 12 years. The Union comorienne pour le progrès thus became the sole legal party.

However, unofficial opposition groups continue to exist, mostly based in France. These include FNUK-UNIKOM (f. from the merger of the Front national uni des komores and the Union des komoriens), led by Abubakar Ahmed Nurdin; the Comité national de salut public, led by Saïd Ali Kemal; and the Association des stagiaires et des étudiants comoriens.

ROADS

There are approximately 750 km of roads serviceable throughout the year. A major road-improvement scheme was launched in 1979, with foreign assistance, and in 1984 a French company won the contract to resurface 170 km of roads on Njazidja and Nzwani islands.

SHIPPING

Large vessels anchor off Moroni, Mutsamudu and Fomboni, and the port of Mutsamudu can now accommodate ships of medium tonnage alongside the quay. Goods from Europe come via Madagascar, and coasters serve the Comoros from the east coast of Africa. In March 1983 the contract for the expansion of the port at Mutsamudu was granted to a French company. The existing jetty was to be extended to accommodate vessels of up to 11 m draught, and work was due to be completed in April 1985. The overall cost of the scheme is estimated at US $45.8m. It is expected that, on completion of this project, Mutsamudu will supersede Moroni as the major port.

Tourism

Fewer than 2,000 tourists a year stay in the islands' four hotels, owing to limited accommodation, few flights to the islands and their political and commercial isolation. In 1981 the government was studying projects aimed at increasing hotel capacity from 87 to 166 rooms, which included the construction of a new hotel in Moroni.

Société Comorienne de Tourisme et d'Hôtellerie (COMOTEL): Itsandra Hotel Njazidja; tel. 2365; national tourist agency.

THE CONGO

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The People's Republic of the Congo has a short coastline on the Atlantic Ocean, from which the country extends northward to Cameroon and the Central African Republic. It is bordered by Gabon in the west, with Zaire to the east, while in the south there is a short frontier with the Cabinda exclave of Angola. The climate is tropical, with temperatures averaging 21°–27°C (70°–80°F) throughout the year. The average annual rainfall is about 1,200 mm (47 in). The official language is French, and many African languages are also used. More than 50% of the population still follow traditional beliefs, although over 30% are Roman Catholics. There are small Protestant and Muslim minorities. The national flag is red, with the state emblem (two green palms enclosing a crossed hammer and hoe, surmounted by a gold star) in the upper hoist. The capital is Brazzaville.

Recent History

Formerly part of French Equatorial Africa, Middle Congo became the autonomous Republic of the Congo, within the French Community, in November 1958. The Congo became fully independent on 15 August 1960. The leading figure in this period was the Abbé Fulbert Youlou, a former Roman Catholic priest who, in contravention of ecclesiastical orders, became involved in politics and was suspended from priestly office. In November 1958 Youlou became Prime Minister, and in November 1959 he was elected President of the Republic by the National Assembly. After independence, the Assembly approved a new constitution for the Congo in March 1961. Under its provisions, Youlou was re-elected President (unopposed) by popular vote. A plan to establish a one-party state was announced by President Youlou in August 1962 and overwhelmingly approved by the National Assembly in April 1963.

However, on 15 August 1963 (the third anniversary of independence and the date scheduled for the introduction of one-party rule) Youlou was forced to resign, following anti-government demonstrations and strikes by trade unionists. On the following day, a provisional government was formed, with the support of military and trade union leaders. Alphonse Massamba-Débat, a former Minister of Planning, became Prime Minister. In December a national referendum approved a new constitution, and a general election was held for a new National Assembly. Later in the month, Massamba-Débat was elected President for a five-year term. The new regime adopted a policy of 'scientific socialism', and in July 1964 the Mouvement national de la révolution (MNR) was established as the sole political party. In June 1965 ex-President Youlou was sentenced to death in absentia.

Tension between the armed forces and the MNR culminated in a military coup in August 1968. The leader of the coup was Capt. (later Major) Marien Ngouabi, a paratroop officer, who became Chief of the General Staff. The National Assembly was replaced by the National Council of the Revolution, led by Ngouabi. The President was briefly restored to office, with reduced powers, but was dismissed again in September, when Capt. (later Major) Alfred Raoul, the new Prime Minister, also became Head of State. In January 1969 he relinquished this position to Major Ngouabi, although remaining Prime Minister until the end of that year.

Ngouabi set up a regime which proclaimed itself Marxist but maintained close economic ties with France. The People's Republic of the Congo, as it became in January 1970, was governed by a single political party, the Parti congolais du travail (PCT). The regime was threatened by left-wing protests and attempted coups, and there were serious ethnic jealousies between the rival tribes. In 1973 Ngouabi introduced a new Constitution and a National Assembly with delegates elected from a single party list. However, Ngouabi felt increasingly insecure, and in 1976 he dismissed the Political Bureau of the PCT, replacing it by a Special Revolutionary General Staff.

In March 1977 Ngouabi was assassinated. Ex-President Massamba-Débat was charged with organizing the attempted coup and later executed. The Government was taken over by an 11-man Military Committee of the PCT, and in April 1977 Col (later Brig.-Gen.) Joachim Yhombi-Opango, the Chief of Staff, was named as the new Head of State.

The worsening economic crisis and the inherited regional and ethnic imbalances, however, made Yhombi-Opango's regime vulnerable to both left and right. In April 1977 he abrogated the Constitution and suspended the National Assembly. In August 1978 a plot to overthrow the Government was reported. In February 1979 Yhombi-Opango and the Military Committee handed over their powers to the Central Committee of the PCT. Following an election in March, Col Denis Sassou-Nguesso became President of the Republic, having assumed power in the interim month as head of a Provisional Committee. In July a National Assembly and regional councils were also elected, and the new socialist Constitution was overwhelmingly approved in a referendum. At the Third PCT Congress in July 1984, Sassou-Nguesso was unanimously re-elected President of the PCT Central Committee and President of the Republic for a second five-year term. An extensive government reshuffle followed, with the aim of 'strengthening the revolutionary process'. Ex-President Yhombi-Opango, who had been detained since March 1979, was released in November 1984.

In foreign policy, the Congo has moved away from being within the Soviet sphere of influence, as was apparent in the mid-1970s, and has fostered links with France, the USA and the People's Republic of China. There was an improvement in relations with France following the victory of the French left in the 1981 elections, and President Mitterrand paid an official visit to the Congo in October 1982. Western nations, particularly France, remain the chief source of development aid, but some Eastern bloc aid is received in the form of military and security assistance. The Congo is committed to the survival of the OAU (see p. 188), and is a member of the Customs and Economic Union of Central Africa (UDEAC) (see p. 154).

Government

There is only one political party, the Parti congolais du travail (PCT), which professes Marxist-Leninist principles. The President of the Central Committe of the PCT is the President of the Republic, Head of State and Head of Government, elected for a five-year term by the Congress of the PCT. Executive power rests with the Council of Ministers under the chairmanship of the President of the Republic. The main legislative body is the People's National Assembly, which was re-established in 1979. The 153 members are elected by universal adult suffrage from a list put forward by the PCT. The Assembly is responsible to the Prime Minister, himself responsible to the PCT.

Responsibility for local administration is vested in nine Popular Regional Councils, each with an Executive Committee elected by universal franchise. They act under the direction of 10 Commissars designated by the Central Committee of the PCT.

Defence

In July 1984 the army numbered 8,000, the navy 200 and the air force 500. There were 3,000 men in paramilitary forces, and 750 Cuban troops were stationed in the country. National service is compulsory for men and women. The defence budget for 1984 was 21,597m. francs CFA.

Economic Affairs

Prior to the development of the petroleum industry, the most important economic activity was traditionally forestry, employing, with agriculture, 33% of the working population in 1981. Forests cover approximately 60% of the country's area, and more than half is exploitable. Reserves of timber are estimated to be between 90m. and 120m. cu m, with a production capacity of 850,000 cu m per year. Species include okoumé and limba. In 1978 major eucalyptus plantations were installed, and there are now plans for a wood-pulp plant near Pointe-Noire, with capacity of 250,000 tons per year. Poor transport facilities have greatly hindered the development of forestry production. As a result of the decline in world demand for timber in the early 1970s, production of industrial logs, 845,000 cu m in 1971, had virtually ceased by 1975. The market began to recover in 1976, as a result of public investment, both in reafforestation and in research, but in 1981 exports amounted to only 205,053 cu m. The state-owned timber monopoly, Société Nationale d'Exploitation des Bois, suffered losses totalling 81.4m. francs CFA in 1982, largely owing to stagnation in world timber prices.

Agriculture accounts for about 12% of GDP. The staple crops are cassava and plantains, while maize, groundnuts and rice are also cultivated. The major cash crops are sugar cane, oil palm, cocoa and coffee. Cocoa is cultivated on 8,000 ha in the north-west Sangha region, and production of cocoa beans in 1982 was estimated at 4,000 metric tons. Coffee production totalled an estimated 5,000 tons in 1982. Sugar production has been taken over by a Franco-Dutch concern, while the output of tobacco, once a major cash crop, has dwindled as a result of the drift of producers into more profitable crops. The Government is undertaking extensive development and plantation projects to revive production of palm oil, coffee and cocoa, following a general decline in agricultural production since independence. Low prices for coffee and cocoa in 1981/82 depressed export earnings from these commodities to only 76% of expected revenue.

By 1983 there were seven oil fields in operation, and further exploration was being carried out on and off shore. The Congo's first field, at Pointe-Indienne, began production in 1960 but was in decline by 1981. The largest field, Emeraude, has estimated reserves of 800m. tons, but had yielded only 13m. tons by 1982 because the viscosity of the petroleum hampers extraction. A scheme to inject steam into the oil, to facilitate extraction, was being considered in 1984. The Congo's total production of crude petroleum rose from 2.6m. tons in 1979 to 4.5m. tons in 1982 and to 5.4m. tons in 1983. Production was expected to reach 6m. tons in 1984 and to stabilize at 7m. tons per year from 1985. The operative oil companies are mainly French and Italian, and interest has been shown by US oil corporations. The Congo is not a member of OPEC. A refinery at Pointe-Noire, with an annual distillation capacity of 1m. tons, began production in 1982, to handle 25% of national output, producing heavy fuel oil, kerosene and motor spirit. Sales of petroleum and derivatives accounted for 88.7% of export revenue in 1981. Since 1980 the Government's revenue from petroleum has contributed between 60% and 70% of the national budget. There are deposits of natural gas at Pointe-Indienne, where production was 1.4m. cu m in 1979, but remaining reserves are not large enough to warrant commercial exploitation.

Although one of the most industrialized countries in Africa, the Congo is still economically dependent since agriculture does not supply all the food needs of the urban areas, nor provide enough materials for industry. The Government's development planning is now concentrated on improving the transport infrastructure, to enable forest potential to be exploited, increasing food production, and halting the rural exodus which has resulted in a big increase in urban unemployment since 1977. As part of the Government's programme to restructure the agricultural sector, several 'pilot villages' are being constructed to promote community life in rural areas. Proposed expenditure under the 1982–86 Plan was originally 1,108, 900m. francs CFA, but the Government has had to adopt a flexible approach to planned spending in the light of recent fluctuations in the price of petroleum. Economic growth during the late 1960s averaged only 2.6% annually, despite a high rate of investment. Following a period of stagnation, GDP growth in 1974–79 increased to an annual average of 3.5%, mainly as a result of increased petroleum production and higher prices. GDP totalled 804,000m. francs CFA in 1983.

In 1982, according to World Bank estimates, the Congo's GNP per head was US $1,180 (at average 1980–82 prices), one of the highest levels in sub-Saharan Africa. It was estimated that the average annual increase in GNP per head was 2.7%, in real terms, between 1960 and 1982.

Transport and Communications

The River Congo and its tributary the Oubangui are the principal means of transport. Brazzaville is an important port on the River Congo. The rivers and the railway line, from Pointe-Noire on the Atlantic to Brazzaville (with a branch to the manganese mines at Mouanda in Gabon), are important links between Chad, the Central African Republic and the coast. A major realignment project, financed by international aid, is nearing completion. The new track runs to the south of the original line and is suitable for faster trains and more traffic. Roads are few, with only 8,246 km usable throughout the year. The Congo has its own internal air service and the Government has a share in Air Afrique.

Social Welfare

There is a state pension scheme and a system of family allowances and other welfare services. The health system consists of three general hospitals, 32 medical centres, 371 dispensaries, 17 school and university clinics and eight centres for contagious diseases, giving a total of 5,417 hospital beds. In 1981 there were 266 physicians and 849 qualified nurses.

Education

Education is officially compulsory for 10 years between six and 16 years of age. Primary education begins at the age of six and lasts for six years. Secondary education, from 12 years of age, last for seven years, comprising a first cycle of four years and a second of three years. In 1978 the literacy rate among children of school age was 93%, one of the highest in Africa. In 1965 all private schools were taken over by the government. A number of students go to France for technical instruction. The Marien Ngouabi University, at Brazzaville, was founded in 1971.

Tourism

There were 558 hotel rooms in 1981 but provision is made in the 1982–86 development plan to increase this to 1,000 rooms. Brazzaville has three international hotels, but there is a shortage of accommodation in Pointe-Noire, where the oil and business sectors are increasing demand. A regional hotel chain is to be set up to cater for travellers in the provinces. There are plans to turn Mbamou Island into a tourist attraction. Tourist arrivals in 1980 totalled 36,000.

Public Holidays

1985: 1 May (Labour Day), 31 July (Revolution Day), 15 August (Independence Day), 25 December (Christmas), 31 December (Foundation of the Party).

1986: 1 January (New Year's Day), 18 March ('Day of Supreme Sacrifice', anniversary of President Ngouabi's assassination), 28 March (Good Friday), 31 March (Easter Monday).

Directory

The Constitution

A new Constitution was approved by national referendum on 8 July 1979. The Constitution was amended in July 1984. The following is a summary of its provisions:

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES

The People's Republic of the Congo is a sovereign independent state, in which all power springs from the people and belongs to the people. Treason against the people is the greatest crime. All nationals are guaranteed freedom of conscience and religion, and religious communities are free to practise their faith, but political organizations based on religion are banned. The land is the property of the people, and as necessary the state shall regulate its use. The state directs the economic life and development of the country according to the general plan. The right to own and inherit private property is guaranteed, and expropriation is governed by law.

HEAD OF STATE

The Chairman of the Central Committee of the Parti congolais du travail (PCT) is the President of the Republic, Head of State and Head of Government. He is elected for a five-year term by the Congress of the PCT.

THE EXECUTIVE

Executive power is vested in the Council of Ministers, under the Chairmanship of the President of the Republic. It directs and orientates the action of the Government; Ministers are appointed by the Prime Minister, who is responsible to the party.

THE LEGISLATURE

Most legislative powers are vested in the People's National Assembly. It has 153 members, elected by all adults over the age of 18 from a list put out by the PCT, with representatives from the party, mass organizations (including women and students), and workers, peasants and craftsmen. It is responsible to the Prime Minister and undertakes tasks entrusted to him by the party. The President of the National Assembly is second in rank only to the President of the Republic.

THE PARTY

The sole political party is the Parti congolais du travail (PCT). Its Political Bureau of 10 members takes part in government. Its Central Committee consists of 60 members, including the Political Bureau, most of the Ministers and the Chief of Staff of the army, chaired by the President of the Republic and Head of State. The Central Committee's powers include the initiation of revisions to the constitution, which become final when approved by the National Assembly, and the appointment of judges to the Revolutionary Court of Justice.

Note: In August 1984 a Constitutional Council was established by Presidential statute, assuming powers hitherto exercised by the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court.

In August 1978, after the discovery of a plot to overthrow the government, a state security court was established by decree to try 'current and future crimes against the Congolese revolution'.

COSTA RICA

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Costa Rica lies in the Central American isthmus, with Nicaragua to the north, Panama to the south, the Caribbean Sea to the east and the Pacific Ocean to the west. The climate is warm and damp in the lowlands (average temperature 27°C (81°F)) and cooler on the Central Plateau (average temperature 22°C (72°F)) where two-thirds of the population live. The language is Spanish. Almost all of the inhabitants profess Christianity, and the overwhelming majority adhere to the Roman Catholic Church, the state religion. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) has five horizontal stripes, of blue, white, red, white and blue, the red stripe being twice the width of the others. The state flag, in addition, has on the red stripe (to the left of centre) a white oval enclosing the national coat of arms, showing three volcanic peaks between the Caribbean and the Pacific. The capital is San José.

Recent History

Costa Rica was ruled by Spain from the 16th century until 1821, when independence was declared. The only significant interruption in the country's constitutional government since 1920 occurred in February 1948, when the result of the presidential election was disputed. The legislature annulled the election in March but a civil war ensued. The anti-government forces, led by José Figueres Ferrer, were successful, and a revolutionary junta took power in April. Costa Rica's army was abolished in December 1948. After the preparation of a new constitution, the victorious candidate of the 1948 election took office in January 1949.

Figueres, who founded the socialist Partido de Liberación Nacional (PLN), dominated national politics for decades, holding presidential office in 1953–58 and 1970–74. Under his leadership, Costa Rica became one of the most democratic countries in Latin America. Since the 1948 revolution, there have been frequent changes of power, all achieved by constitutional means. Figueres' first Government nationalized the banks and instituted a comprehensive social security system. The presidential election of 1958 was won by a conservative, Mario Echandi Jiménez, who reversed many PLN policies. His successor, Francisco Orlich Bolmarich (President from 1962 to 1966), was supported by the PLN but continued the encouragement of private enterprise. Another conservative, José Joaquín Trejos Fernández, held power in 1966–70. In 1974 the PLN candidate, Daniel Oduber Quirós, was elected President. Communist and other left-wing parties were legalized in 1975. In 1978 Rodrigo Carazo Odio of the conservative Partido Unidad Opositora (PUO) coalition (subsequently the Coalición Unidad) was elected President. During Carazo's term of office the worsening instability in Central America led to diplomatic tension, and in 1981 the President was criticized for his alleged involvement in illegal arms trafficking between Cuba and El Salvador.

At presidential and legislative elections in February 1982, Luis Alberto Monge Alvarez of the PLN gained a comfortable majority and his party won 33 of the 57 seats in the Legislative Assembly. Monge was inaugurated as President in May. He announced a 100-day emergency economic programme and a policy of fiscal conservatism in an attempt to rescue the country from the near-bankruptcy inherited from President Carazo. Unlike other members of the Socialist International, Monge did not denounce the elections in El Salvador in March 1982, although he continued a policy of neutrality regarding Nicaragua. Incursions from across the border increased, and in May a national alert was declared. The rebel Nicaraguan, Edén Pastora Gómez, was expelled from Costa Rica to prevent the country from becoming a base for anti-Sandinista military activity. Relations with Nicaragua continued to worsen as guerrilla activity spread to San José and included a spate of kidnappings. The formation of the paramilitary Organización para Emergencias Nacionales (OPEN) increased speculation that President Monge intended to re-establish a national army, following pressure from the USA and Israel. In May 1983 Costa Rica requested that an OAS peace-keeping force be sent to the border with Nicaragua, and in October plans for the acquisition of an anti-aircraft defence system were announced.

Throughout 1983, President Monge came under increasing pressure from liberal members of the cabinet and PLN supporters to adopt a more neutral stance in foreign policy. In March ministers from Costa Rica and Nicaragua met to discuss plans for trade and economic co-operation. Three leading members of the anti-Sandinista movement were expelled from Costa Rica in May, and 80 of Pastora's supporters were arrested in September. In addition, some 82 guerrilla camps were dismantled by the Civil Guard. In November 1983 President Monge declared Costa Rica's neutrality in an attempt to elicit foreign support for his country. This declaration was opposed by the USA and led to the resignation of the Foreign Minister.

In January 1984 the cancellation of a US-financed plan, involving the use of American soldiers in construction work along Costa Rica's border with Nicaragua, was regarded as an indication of the Government's desire to seek improved relations with Nicaragua. In May, however, relations deteriorated following reports of an air raid by the Nicaraguan Air Force on a border village in Costa Rica and of an increasing number of incursions by the Sandinista forces. As a result of the skirmishes, the US Government disclosed that Costa Rica had requested US $9.6m. in security aid, including $2.8m. in emergency aid. It was believed that the US Government was exerting considerable pressure on Costa Rica to abandon its policy of neutrality and to join other Central American countries in condemning the Sandinistas. Costa Rica denied reports that it would participate in joint manoeuvres with US forces. Public opposition to any renunciation of neutrality was emphasized by a demonstration in support of peace and neutrality, held in San José and attended by over 20,000 people. In an attempt to defuse the tense situation at the border, the Costa Rican and Nicaraguan Governments, assisted by representatives of the Contadora group (Colombia, Mexico, Panama and Venezuela) which seeks to mediate in disputes involving Central America, agreed to form a commission of supervision and prevention to monitor events in the border area. In late May, however, the attempt to assassinate Edén Pastora Gómez near the Costa Rican border exacerbated the rift within the Cabinet over Nicaragua.

During 1983 there were signs of increasing urban unrest in response to the Government's austerity measures and to the agrarian crisis, which had produced heavy unemployment, principally among workers on banana plantations. By August 1984 the Government's position was regarded as unstable. The division within the Cabinet over policy towards Nicaragua, coupled with the effects of the unpopular austerity programme and a protracted strike by banana plantation workers, which had resulted in two deaths, led to fears of a coup. At President Monge's request, the Cabinet resigned, and in the subsequent reshuffle four Ministers were replaced.

Government

Under the Constitution of 1949, executive power is vested in the President, assisted by two Vice-Presidents (or, in exceptional circumstances, one Vice-President) and an appointed Cabinet. The President is elected for a four-year term by compulsory adult suffrage, and a successful candidate must receive at least 40% of the votes. The legislative organ is the unicameral Legislative Assembly, with 57 members who are similarly elected for four years.

Defence

There have been no armed forces since 1948. Rural and Civil Guards total 7,000 men, and there is a paramilitary force of 2,800 men. Spending on the security forces was estimated to be US $28m. in 1983.

Economic Affairs

Costa Rica's economy is based on the export of coffee, bananas, meat, sugar and cocoa. Staples such as maize, beans and potatoes are also grown. The agricultural and livestock sector generates 22.8% of GDP, employs 61% of the work-force and contributes 61% of Costa Rica's exports. In 1983 coffee and bananas accounted for 25% and 27% of export earnings respectively. The fall in the banana price was offset by a rise in production, but the fall in the world coffee price, which did not recover until 1982, considerably worsened the balance of trade. In 1984 a 72-day strike by banana plantation workers was expected to cause losses of over US $13m. In 1983 a record coffee harvest of 2.3m. bags (each of 60 kg) was produced, and export earnings reached $237m., thereby encouraging government hopes that the coffee industry would play an important part in the country's economic recovery. In 1984 production was expected to increase by 19% in spite of coffee rust disease and a shortage of credit. In 1984 a record output of 245,000 metric tons of raw sugar was expected.

The Government is to develop the estimated 150m. tons of bauxite which has been discovered in the Boruca region. Construction of an aluminium smelter (annual production 280,000 metric tons) and an associated hydroelectric scheme was due to be completed by 1986.

The principal manufacturing sectors are food processing, textiles, chemicals and plastics. During the first half of 1984 industrial output increased by 6%. Investment is concentrated on the energy sector. Hydroelectric capacity totalled 460 MW in 1983 and is scheduled to rise to about 1,000 MW by 1988 with the opening of four new stations. There were plans to develop a 150 MW pilot geothermal project in the north-western Sierra by 1985. In 1981 a programme to develop fuel alcohol from sugar cane and bananas was operating. In 1983 trade agreements were signed with Romania and Mexico to provide technical assistance for the design and building of tourist projects, and financial aid of US $28m. for petroleum exploration in Valle Talamanca. Petroleum production began on a small scale in June 1984.

From a comparatively healthy position in 1977, when the GDP grew by 8.9%, the economy began to deteriorate in 1982, when GDP fell by 5.9%. However, growth of 1% in GDP was recorded in 1983. The trade deficit rose to US $522m. in 1980, as a result of the rising cost of petroleum, the fall in coffee prices and increased imports of consumer goods. However, it improved to $34m. in 1982. Between 1980 and 1983 industrial investment in Costa Rica fell by 38%, with manufacturers working at only 30%–45% of their total capacity. The public sector debt rose from $1,800m. in December 1980 to $2,400m. in September 1981. All $40m. of gold reserves were sold off in May 1981. By December 1982 the public sector debt had reached $3,460m. and the private sector debt totalled $650m. Arrears on servicing totalled $280m. Although Costa Rica had broken three IMF agreements in two years, talks with the IMF were resumed and some interest payments made in June. In December 1982 the IMF agreed to a loan of $100.7m., conditional upon the implementation of an austerity programme. IMF demands included devaluation of the colón, which fell on the free market to 62 per US dollar, representing an 86% depreciation since December 1980. Subsidies on basic items were removed, and the cost of public services rose by up to 90%. Inflation rose from 20% in 1980 to 54% in 1981 and had reached 82% by 1982. A dramatic decline to 11% was recorded in 1983. Unemployment, which had risen to 9.4% by July 1982, remained constant. Wages declined in real terms by 40% from 1982 to 1983. In 1983 the USA gave $145m. in economic aid under the Caribbean Basin Initiative. In September 1983, after two years of negotiations with 200 of its creditor banks, Costa Rica finally agreed terms for rescheduling debts of $1,200m. Under the agreement, a further $350m. in revolving trade facilities would be provided by the banks.

In March 1984 the IMF delayed approval of Costa Rica's request for a loan of US $500m. after the Legislative Assembly had refused to ratify the programme of austerity measures established by the IMF as a condition for the loan. In June the Government announced new controls on foreign exchange and imposed a 200% surtax on 58 imported items. In September the IMF's austerity programme was ratified by the Assembly. Under the terms of the programme, the public sector deficit was to be reduced to 1.5% of GDP while taxes and the cost of essential services were to be increased. In October the colón was devalued for the fourth time in 1984, by 6.6%, to 48.00 per US dollar. In 1984 the balance-of-payments deficit was expected to exceed US $400m. The USA was expected to allocate $180m. in economic aid to Costa Rica in 1984.

Transport and Communications

Excluding 683 km of the Pan-American Highway, there were 28,903 km of roads in 1983. The railway network totalled 833 km in 1984. The principal international ports are Limón and Moín on the Caribbean coast, and Puntarenas, Caldera and Golfito on the Pacific coast. There are also local shipping services to other Central American ports. Caldera has been developed as part of a multi-million dollar project to replace Puntarenas as the principal Pacific port. The main towns and outlying areas are connected by internal air services and there is an international airport outside San José.

Social Welfare

Costa Rica possesses one of the world's most advanced social welfare systems, which provides a complete programme of care and assistance for all wage earners and their dependants.

All social services are co-ordinated by the National Development Plan, run by the Ministry of Planning, and are organized by state institution. Approximately 7% of the GDP and 12% of public spending are allocated to the social services. The Social Security Fund provides health services and general social insurance, the National Insurance Institute provides professional insurance and the Ministry of Health operates a preventive health programme through a chain of health units throughout the country. Benefits include disability and retirement pensions, workers' compensation and family assistance. In 1979 there were 1,506 registered physicians, not all resident and working in Costa Rica. In 1982 there were 28 hospitals and 76 health centres, with a total of 7,706 beds.

Education

All education is free, and elementary education is compulsory between six and 13 years of age. Official secondary education is free and consists of a three-year basic course, followed by a more highly specialized course of two years. Attendance figures are very high: in 1981 an estimated 92% of children aged six to 11 were enrolled at primary schools, while 40% of those aged 12 to 16 received secondary education. There are four universities, one of which is an 'open' university. At 94%, Costa Rica has the highest adult literacy rate in Central America. The education system received 22% of the total budget in 1983.

Tourism

The main tourist features are the Irazú and Poás volcanoes, the Orosí valley, the ruins of the colonial church at Orosí and the jungle train to Limón. Tourists also visit San José, the capital, and the Pacific beaches of Guanacaste and Puntarenas. Tourism is a major growth sector. In 1983 Costa Rica received 326,242 tourists.

The Constitution

The present Constitution of Costa Rica was promulgated in November 1949.

GOVERNMENT

The government is unitary: provincial and local bodies derive their authority from the national government. The country is divided into seven provinces administered by a governor who is appointed by the President. The provinces are divided into cantons, and each canton into districts. There is an elected municipal council in the chief city of each canton, the number of its members being related to the population of the canton. The municipal council supervises the affairs of the canton. Municipal government is closely regulated by national law, particularly in matters of finance.

LEGISLATURE

The government consists of three branches: legislative, executive and judicial. Legislative power is vested in a single chamber, the Legislative Assembly, which meets in regular session twice a year—from 1 May to 31 July, and from 1 September to 30 November. Special sessions may be convoked by the President to consider specified business. The Assembly is composed of 57 deputies elected for four years. The chief powers of the Assembly are to enact laws, levy taxes, authorize declarations of war and, by a two-thirds vote, suspend, in cases of civil disorder, certain civil liberties guaranteed in the Constitution.

Bills may be initiated by the Assembly or by the Executive and must have three readings, in at least two different legislative periods, before they become law. The Assembly may override the presidential vote by a two-thirds vote.

EXECUTIVE

The executive branch is headed by the President, who is assisted by his Cabinet. If he should resign or be incapacitated, the executive power is entrusted to the First Vice-President, and from him to the Second Vice-President, and finally to the President of the Legislative Assembly.

The President sees that the laws and the provisions of the Constitution are carried out, and maintains order. He has power to appoint and remove his ministers and diplomatic representatives; and to negotiate treaties with foreign nations (which are, however, subject to ratification by the Legislative Assembly). He is assisted in his duties by a Cabinet, each member of which is head of an executive department.

ELECTORATE

Suffrage is universal, compulsory and secret for persons over the age of 18 years.

DEFENCE

A novel feature of the Costa Rican Constitution is the clause outlawing a national army. Only by a continental convention or for the purpose of national defence may a military force be organized.

Judicial System

Ultimate judicial power is invested in the Supreme Court, the seventeen justices of which are elected by the Assembly for a term of eight years, and are automatically re-elected for an equal period, unless the Assembly decides to the contrary by a two-thirds vote. Judges of the lower courts are appointed by the Supreme Court in plenary session.

The Supreme Court may also meet as the Corte Plena, with power to declare laws and decrees unconstitutional. There are also four appellate courts, criminal courts, civil courts and special courts. The jury system is not used.

CUBA

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Cuba is an archipelago of two main islands, Cuba and the Isle of Youth (formerly the Isle of Pines), and about 1,600 keys and islets. It lies in the Caribbean Sea, 145 km (90 miles) south of Florida, USA. Other nearby countries are the Bahamas, Mexico, Jamaica and Haiti. The climate is tropical, with the annual rainy season from May to October. The average annual temperature is 25°C (77°F) and hurricanes are frequent. The language is Spanish. Most of the inhabitants are Christians, of whom the great majority are Roman Catholics. The national flag (proportions 2 by 1) has five equal horizontal stripes, of blue, white, blue, white and blue, with a red triangle, enclosing a five-pointed white star, at the hoist. The capital is Havana (La Habana).

Recent History

Cuba was ruled by Spain from the 16th century until 1898, when the island was ceded to the USA after Spain's defeat in the Spanish-American War. Cuba became an independent republic on 20 May 1902, but the USA retained its naval bases on the island and, until 1934, reserved the right to intervene in Cuba's internal affairs. In 1933 an army sergeant, Fulgencio Batista Zaldivar, came to power at the head of a military revolt. Batista ruled the country, directly or indirectly, until 1944, when he retired after serving a four-year term as elected President.

In March 1952, however, Gen. Batista (as he had become) seized power again, deposing President Carlos Prío Socarrás in a bloodless coup. Batista's new regime soon proved to be unpopular and became harshly repressive. In July 1953 a radical opposition group, led by Dr Fidel Castro Ruz, attacked the Moncada army barracks in Santiago de Cuba. Castro was captured, with many of his supporters, but later released. He went into exile and formed a revolutionary movement which was committed to Batista's overthrow. In December 1956 Castro landed in Cuba with a small group of followers, most of whom were captured or killed. However, 12 survivors, including Castro and the Argentine-born Dr Ernesto ('Che') Guevara, escaped into the hills of the Sierra Maestra, where they formed the nucleus of the guerrilla forces which, after a prolonged struggle, forced Batista to flee from Cuba on 1 January 1959.

The assumption of power by the victorious rebels was initially met with great popular acclaim. The 1940 constitution was suspended in January 1959, being replaced by a new 'Fundamental Law'. Executive and legislative power was vested in the Council of Ministers, with Fidel Castro as Prime Minister and his brother Raúl as his deputy. Guevara reportedly ranked third in importance. The new regime ruled by decree but promised to hold elections within 18 months. When it was firmly established, the Castro Government adopted a radical economic programme, including agrarian reform and the nationalization of industrial and commercial enterprises. These drastic reforms, combined with the regime's authoritarian nature, provoked opposition from some sectors of the population, including former supporters of Castro, and many Cubans went into exile.

All US business interests in Cuba were expropriated, without compensation, in October 1960, and the USA severed diplomatic relations in January 1961. A US-sponsored force of anti-Castro Cuban émigrés landed in April 1961 at the Bay of Pigs, in southern Cuba, but the invasion was thwarted by Castro's troops. Later in the year, all pro-government groups were merged to form the Integrated Revolutionary Organizations (ORI). In December 1961 Fidel Castro publicly announced that Cuba had become a Communist state, and he proclaimed a 'Marxist-Leninist' programme for the country's future development. In January 1962 Cuba was excluded from active participation in the Organization of American States (OAS). The USA instituted a full economic and political blockade of Cuba. Hostility to the USA was accompanied by increasingly close relations between Cuba and the USSR. In October 1962 the USA revealed the presence of Soviet missiles in Cuba but, after the imposition of a US naval blockade, the weapons were withdrawn. In 1964 the OAS imposed diplomatic and commercial sanctions against Cuba.

The ORI was replaced in 1962 by a new United Party of the Cuban Socialist Revolution (PURSC), which was established, under Fidel Castro's leadership, as the country's sole legal party. Guevara resigned his military and government posts in April 1965, subsequently leaving Cuba to pursue revolutionary activities abroad. In October 1965 the PURSC was renamed the Communist Party of Cuba (PCC). Although it is ostracized by most other Latin American countries, the PCC Government has maintained and consolidated its internal authority, with little effective opposition. Supported by considerable aid from the USSR, the regime has made significant progress in social and economic development, including improvements in education and public health. At the same time, Cuba has continued to give active support to left-wing revolutionary movements in Latin America and in many other parts of the world. Guevara was killed in Bolivia in October 1967.

In June 1974 the country's first elections since the revolution were held for municipal offices in Matanzas province. Cuba's first 'socialist' constitution was submitted to the first Congress of the PCC, held in December 1975, and came into force in February 1976, after being approved by popular referendum. The PCC Congress also elected a new Central Committee and an enlarged Politburo. In addition, the existing six provinces were reorganized to form 14. As envisaged by the new constitution, elections for municipal assemblies were held in October 1976. These assemblies later elected delegates to provincial assemblies and deputies to the National Assembly of People's Power, inaugurated in December 1976 as 'the supreme organ of state'. The National Assembly chose the members of a new Council of State, with Fidel Castro as President. The second Congress of the PCC was held in December 1980, when Fidel and Raúl Castro were re-elected First and Second Secretaries respectively. The Politburo and the Central Committee were enlarged, and details of the 1981–85 Plan were announced. Election of candidates to the 169 municipal assemblies took place in October 1981. The National Assembly was inaugurated for a second five-year term in December. Fidel Castro was re-elected by the Assembly as President of the Council of State, and Raúl Castro re-elected as First Vice-President.

Although the OAS voted in favour of allowing member countries to normalize their relations with the Cuban Government in 1975, Cuba remained excluded from participation in OAS activities. Relations with the USA deteriorated because of Cuban involvement in the Angolan war in 1976 and in the Ethiopian–Somali war in 1977, and withdrawal of Cuban troops from Africa was made the condition for lifting the US trade embargo. The raising of emigration restrictions in April 1980 resulted in an attempt by more than 125,000 Cubans to enter the USA by landing in Florida. In 1981 the hostility between the two countries was exacerbated by US allegations concerning the extent of Cuban political and military activity abroad, and by the Cuban accusation that the USA had been instrumental in introducing the five agricultural diseases and epidemics which had decimated Cuban crops and livestock, resulting in the deaths of more than 150 people.

In 1981 Cuba expressed interest in discussing foreign policy with the USA, and declared that the shipment of arms to guerrilla groups in Central America had ceased. High-level talks between the two countries took place in November 1981 but US hostility increased. Economic sanctions were tightened, the major air link was closed, and tourism and investment by US nationals was prohibited in April 1982. A naval blockade was considered. Cuba's support of Argentina during the 1982 crisis concerning the Falkland Islands improved relations with the rest of Latin America, and the country's legitimacy was finally acknowledged when it was elected chairman of the UN General Assembly Committee on Decolonization in September 1982, while continuing to play a leading role in the Non-Aligned Movement despite its firm alliance with the Soviet bloc.

In July 1983 President Castro announced his support for the peace initiative of the Contadora group (Colombia, Mexico, Panama and Venezuela), which called for a negotiated settlement to the problems in Central America. In addition, President Castro proposed a reciprocal arrangement between Cuba and the USA to allow for a reduction in the number of military personnel in Central America and for a halt to the supply of armaments to the region. However, an increase in US military activity in Honduras and the Caribbean region led President Castro to declare a 'state of national alert' in August. The US invasion of Grenada in October, and the ensuing short-lived confrontation between US forces and Cuban personnel on the island, severely damaged hopes that the two countries might reach an agreement over Central America, and left Cuba isolated in the Caribbean, following the weakening of its diplomatic and military ties with Suriname in November.

Cuba's concern that the probable re-election of the US President, Ronald Reagan, in November 1984 would increase the possibility of an invasion by the USA, aimed at the overthrow of the Castro regime, prompted moves to expand and strengthen the civil defence system. In public speeches throughout 1984, however, President Castro appeared to adopt a more conciliatory approach towards relations with the USA. In June Cuba granted the release of 48 Cuban and US prisoners who had been detained for political and criminal offences. In July official negotiations were begun with the USA on the issues of immigration and repatriation. In December agreement was reached on the resumption of Cuban immigration to the USA and the repatriation of 2,746 Cuban 'undesirables', who had accompanied other Cuban refugees to the USA in 1980.

In January 1984 plans were announced for a reduction in the number of Cuban personnel in Ethiopia, from 10,000 to 3,000 men. In addition, Cuba was believed to be agreeable to a gradual withdrawal of its estimated 25,000 troops in Angola, conditional upon a concurrent withdrawal of South African forces from Namibia. In November Cuba was reported to be ready to sign a four-part agreement on its withdrawal from Angola.

Government

Under the 1976 constitution, the first since the 1959 revolution, the supreme organ of state, and the sole legislative authority, is the National Assembly of People's Power, with 500 deputies elected for five years by municipal assemblies. The National Assembly elects 31 of its members to form the Council of State, the Assembly's permanent organ. The Council of State is the highest representative of the state, and its President is both Head of State and Head of Government. Executive and administrative authority is vested in the Council of Ministers, appointed by the National Assembly on the proposal of the Head of State. Municipal, regional and provincial assemblies have also been established. The Communist Party of Cuba, the only authorized political party, is 'the leading force of society and the state'.

Defence

Conscription for military service is for a three-year period from 17 years of age, and conscripts also work on the land. In July 1984, according to Western estimates, the army numbered 125,000, the navy 12,000 and the air force 16,000. Army reserves numbered a further 190,000. Paramilitary forces include 15,000 State Security troops, 3,500 border guards and a Youth Labour Army of about 100,000. In 1980 a local militia organization (Milicias de Tropas Territoriales—MTT), comprising 1.2m. men and women, was formed. Estimated expenditure on defence and internal security for 1985 was 1,470.9m. pesos. Considerable aid is received from communist countries, notably the USSR.

Economic Affairs

The state-controlled Cuban economy is basically agricultural and is heavily dependent upon the annual output of cane sugar, which provides the country with 80–85% of its export revenue. Production of raw sugar reached a record 8.2m. metric tons in the 1981/82 season, and seven new sugar mills were under construction. Most of Cuba's sugar exports are sold at fixed prices under long-term agreements, mainly to the USSR and other countries in the Eastern bloc. Any surplus production for export is sold on the free market. However, the world sugar price of 8 US cents per lb. in 1982, down from 28 cents per lb. in 1980, did not even cover production costs. As a result, Cuba's export earnings from sugar in 1982 were 11% less than in 1981. A further setback for the industry was the devastating rainfall during the first four months of 1983, which reduced the annual output of raw sugar to 7.2m. metric tons. Because of the fall in production, Cuba was unable to fulfil its quota (2.4m. metric tons) of free-market exports under the International Sugar Agreement. Production was expected to reach 8.2m. metric tons in 1983/84. In spite of falling world prices for sugar and the problems inherent in economic dependence upon one commodity, additional resources are to be devoted to increasing production, which it was hoped would reach 11m. metric tons by 1990. The annual harvest of Cuba's second most important export crop, tobacco, was also severely damaged by the rains in 1983, following a record output of 54,000 tons in 1981/82, and amounted to only 45,000 tons in 1982/83. It was expected to increase to 50,000 tons in 1983/84. The financial loss which was caused by the destruction of other crops in 1983 amounted to US $60m. Cuban exports of citrus fruits are of increasing significance. With heavy investment by other CMEA countries, Cuba planned to increase overall production of citrus fruits to 1.4m. tons in 1985, and to 2.6m. tons in 1990, in an attempt to reduce dependence on sugar. Dairy cattle are being introduced on a large scale, and the livestock sector expanded by 6.2% in 1983. Overall growth in the agricultural sector in 1983 was 0.6%. As a result of extensive government investment in the fishing industry, Cuba's total catch rose from 27,100 tons in 1959 to a record 213,000 tons in 1978.

Cuba possesses about one-tenth of the world's known nickel reserves, and nickel is Cuba's second most important export commodity. Production of nickel and cobalt fell from 40,260 metric tons in 1981 to 37,603 tons in 1982, but was expected to reach 78,000 tons in 1985, when a third plant was due to come into operation. Cuba supplies 35% of the CMEA's nickel requirements. There are also deposits of copper, chromite, manganese and iron ore. Cuba is dependent on the USSR for 98% of its petroleum requirements of 206,000 barrels per day. Cuba was guaranteed 61m. tons of petroleum in 1981–85. Exploration for petroleum in Cuba is being undertaken with Soviet and Mexican assistance, and considerable finds on the northern coast, near Varadero, have been announced. Domestic production in 1983 was 280,000 metric tons. It was hoped that production would reach 770,000 tons in 1984 and 2m. tons in 1989. A new petroleum refinery, under construction at Cienfuegos, is due to come into operation in 1987. Cuba's refining capacity is 6.5m. tons. A nuclear energy plant is also under construction at Juraguá, Cienfuegos, and will have a generating capacity of 1,760 MW.

The bulk of installed industrial capacity is made up of plants for processing agricultural produce and for the production of cement, fertilizers, textiles, domestic consumer goods and agricultural machinery. Industrial development is accorded high priority and the 1983 budget allocated 3,500m. pesos to industrial concerns. Cuba's output of crude steel rose from 301,200 metric tons in 1982 to 363,700 tons in 1983. Plans for Cuban-Soviet co-operation, announced in 1981, included an integrated steelmill with an annual capacity of 1.3m. tons. In 1981 the Karl Marx cement factory, with a capacity of 1.65m. metric tons per year, was completed at a cost of US $208m. (equivalent). A plant for the assembly of motor vehicles from imported parts is planned. Industrial production is hampered by Cuba's dependence on Western technology and by a shortage of spare parts for US-made industrial machinery. In 1983 the industrial sector recorded growth of 4.7%. In 1983 trade agreements were signed with other CMEA countries to provide Cuba with quality steel, food products and medicine.

In 1983 Cuba's trade turnover (imports plus exports) with Eastern bloc countries amounted to US $4,600m., about 80% of the country's total trade. In 1982 total Soviet aid was estimated at US $4,000m. In November 1980 an economic exchange agreement was signed, pledging Soviet aid up to the year 2000 at a total value of at least $35,000m. US trade sanctions have restricted potential trade with Western countries and increased dependence on the USSR. In an attempt to improve the country's foreign debt situation, a programme of stringent economic measures was enforced, and imports of 'hard currency' goods were allowed to decline from 49% of total imports in 1975 to 14% in 1983. In addition, Cuba hopes to increase trade with the West from 23% of the total in 1981 to more than 30% by 1985. Falling prices of tobacco, nickel and especially sugar have brought about a severe economic crisis. In 1983 exports in hard currency declined by 354m. pesos to 1,020m. pesos. The trade deficit in 1980 was US $1,400m. despite cheap supplies of petroleum and generous prices for exports of sugar and nickel to the USSR. The total debt to the USSR in June 1982 was $9,000m., and repayment has been delayed until 1986. Reserves were reduced to $130m. in September 1981, when foreign banks withdrew loans and deposits of $570m. In January 1983 Cuba announced that there would be no repayments on debt principal which was to fall due between January 1983 and December 1985. Interest payments would be maintained. However, following negotiations with creditor banks, only US $675m. of debt awaited rescheduling by December 1983. Cuba's total debt to the West was US $3,300m. at the end of 1983. In 1984 Cuba hoped to reschedule US $350m. in outstanding debts to commercial banks. In December 1984 agreement was reached on the rescheduling of US $130m. of debt.

In 1981 the Cuban economy expanded by 12%, mainly as a result of the recovery by the agricultural sector. In 1983 Cuba's gross output (excluding non-material services) went up by 5.2%. In the first quarter of 1984 economic growth of 11.7% was achieved, a large proportion of which was attributed to increased productivity of 22.9% in the sugar industry. The official figure for economic growth in the whole of 1984, however, was 7%. The first Five-Year Development Plan (1981–85), based on high projected world prices for sugar, proved to be too ambitious and costly, and a new, more realistic plan, which involved no new investment, was being developed. State subsidies were reduced by about two-thirds, with a loss of more than 170m. pesos to state enterprises, while public spending and imports both declined in 1982. Consumer prices rose by 10%, and unemployment was estimated to be 3.4%. After 1970, financial incentives were introduced to boost productivity, and in 1980 a free market for surplus agricultural produce was introduced to undermine the 'black market' which had developed as a result of shortages and rationing. However, the free market was suspended after corrupt practices were discovered. In spite of severe economic measures, a consumer boom was reported, revealing an increase in the level of personal income of 218.6% between 1970 and 1982. In February 1982 the need for hard currency prompted an invitation to foreign companies to engage in joint projects to build factories and tourist facilities with a 49% interest and generous fiscal incentives. Several companies expressed interest but were deterred by fear of US sanctions.

Transport and Communications

In 1984 there were 14,834 km of railways and 34,000 km of roads. An eight-lane highway runs the length of the island from Pinar del Río to Santiago de Cuba. In 1983 the merchant fleet comprised 96 vessels with a cargo capacity of more than 1m. d.w.t. The 1981–85 Development Plan envisages investment in port facilities of US $350 m., mostly in the two principal ports of Havana Bay and Cienfuegos. There are international airports at La Habana, Santiago de Cuba and Camagüey. Work began in October 1984 on a new international airport, to be built between Varadero and Matanzas. There are plans to construct an underground system of transport in Havana.

Social Welfare

Through the State Social Security System, employees receive benefits for sickness, accidents, maternity, disability, retirement and unemployment. Health services are free. In 1984 there were 60,037 hospital beds and 17,000 physicians. The 1983 budget allocation for health and education was 2,158.3m. pesos.

Education

Education is universal and free at all levels. Education is based on Marxist-Leninist principles and combines study with manual work. The 1981–85 Development Plan emphasizes improvement of professional and technological education, especially in medicine, economics, accountancy and teaching.

Pre-school national schools are run by the state for children of five years of age, and day nurseries are available for all children after their 45th day. Primary education, from six to 12 years of age, is compulsory, and secondary education lasts from 13 to 16 (to be extended to 18) years of age. In 1978 an estimated 99% of children aged six to 11 attended primary schools, while 61% of those aged 12 to 17 were enrolled at secondary schools. In 1984 there were 220,000 students in higher education. Workers undergoing university courses receive a state subsidy to provide for their dependants. Courses at intermediate and higher levels have an emphasis on technology, agriculture and teacher training. In 1979 the estimated illiteracy rate among persons aged 15 to 49 was only 4.6% (males 4.3%; females 4.9%). Adult education centres gave basic education to 342,769 people in 1981/82.

Tourism

Cuba has much to attract the tourist, including a colonial cultural heritage, forests, mountains and a coastline with many bays and inlets, providing excellent bathing, diving and fishing. Tourism began to develop after 1977, with the lifting of travel restrictions by the USA, and the country subsequently attracted European tourists. The majority of visitors come from Canada, Spain and Mexico. US travel restrictions were reimposed in 1982. However, more than 100,000 tourists visited Cuba in 1983, compared with only 4,000 in 1973. Twenty-nine new hotels were opened between 1976 and 1981, and 30 new hotels are planned, with a projected total capacity of 20,200 rooms. Investment in tourism during 1983 amounted to 21m. pesos, and included the development of new and existing sites.

Public Holidays

1985: 1 May (Labour Day), 25–27 July (Anniversary of the 1953 Revolution), 10 October (Wars of Independence Day).

1986: 1 January (Liberation Day).

The Constitution

Following the assumption of power by the Castro regime on 1 January 1959, the Constitution was suspended and a Fundamental Law of the Republic was instituted with effect from 7 February 1959. In February 1976 Cuba's first socialist Constitution came into force after being submitted to the first Congress of the Communist Party of Cuba in December 1975 and to popular referendum in February 1976.

POLITICAL, SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC PRINCIPLES

The Republic of Cuba is a socialist state in which all power belongs to the working people. The Communist Party of Cuba is the leading force of society and the state. The socialist state carries out the will of the working people and guarantees work, medical care, education, food, clothing and housing. The Republic of Cuba is part of the world socialist community. It bases its relations with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and with other socialist countries on socialist internationalism, friendship, co-operation and mutual assistance. It hopes to establish one large community of nations within Latin America and the Caribbean.

The State organizes and directs the economic life of the nation in accordance with a central social and economic development plan. Foreign trade is the exclusive function of the State. The State recognizes the right of small farmers to own their lands and other means of production and to sell that land. The State guarantees the right of citizens to ownership of personal property in the form of earnings, savings, place of residence and other possessions and objects which serve to satisfy their material and cultural needs. The State also guarantees the right of inheritance.

Cuban citizenship is acquired by birth or through naturalization.

The State protects the family, motherhood and matrimony.

The State directs and encourages all aspects of education, culture and science.

All citizens have equal rights and are subject to equal duties.

The State guarantees the right to medical care, education, freedom of speech and press, assembly, demonstration, association and privacy. In the socialist society work is the right and duty, and a source of pride for every citizen.

GOVERNMENT

National Assembly of People's Power

The National Assembly of People's Power is the supreme organ of the State and is the only organ with constituent and legislative authority. It is composed of deputies over the age of 18 elected by the Municipal Assemblies of People's Power, for a period of five years. All Cuban citizens over the age of 16, except those who are mentally incapacitated or who have committed a crime, are eligible to vote. The National Assembly of People's Power holds two ordinary sessions a year and a special session when requested by one third of the deputies or by the Council of State. More than half the total number of deputies must be present for a session to be held.

All decisions made by the Assembly, except those relating to constitutional reforms, are adopted by a simple majority of votes. The deputies may be recalled by their electors at any time.

The National Assembly of People's Power has the following functions:

to reform the constitution;

to approve, modify and annul laws;

to supervise all organs of the State and government;

to decide on the constitutionality of laws and decrees;

to revoke decree-laws issued by the Council of State; to discuss and approve economic and social development plans, the state budget, monetary and credit systems;

to approve the general outlines of foreign and domestic policy, to ratify and annul international treaties, to declare war and approve peace treaties;

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

The country is divided into 14 provinces and 169 municipalities. The provinces are: Pinar del Rio, Habana, Ciudad de la Habana, Matanzas, Villa Clara, Cienfuegos, Sancti Spíritus, Ciego de Avila, Camagüey, Las Tunas, Holguín, Granma, Santiago de Cuba and Guantánamo.

Voting for delegates to the municipal assemblies is direct, secret and voluntary. All citizens over 16 years of age are eligible to vote. The number of delegates to each assembly is proportionate to the number of people living in that area. A delegate must obtain more than half the number of votes cast in the constituency in order to be elected. The Municipal Assemblies are elected for a period of two and a half years and are headed by Executive Committees elected from the members of the Municipal Assemblies. The members of the Executive Committees form five Regional Assemblies and the members of the Regional Assemblies in turn form Provincial Assemblies also headed by an Executive Committee. Membership of regional and provincial executive committees is proposed by a commission of Communist Party members and youth and trade union representatives. The President and Secretary of each of the regional and the provincial assemblies are the only full-time members, the other delegates carrying out their functions in addition to their normal employment.

The regular and extraordinary sessions of the local Assemblies of People's Power are public. More than half the total number of members must be present in order for agreements made to be valid. Agreements are adopted by simple majority.

JUDICIARY

Judicial power is exercised by the People's Supreme Court and all other competent tribunals and courts. The People's Supreme Court is the supreme judicial authority and is accountable only to the National Assembly of People's Power. It can propose laws and issue regulations through its Council of Government. Judges are independent but the courts must inform the electorate of their activities at least once a year. Every accused person has the right to a defence and can be tried only by a tribunal.

The Office of the Attorney-General is subordinate only to the National Assembly and the Council of State and is responsible for ensuring that the law is properly obeyed.

The Constitution may be modified only by a two-thirds majority vote in the National Assembly of People's Power.

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Djibouti is in the Horn of Africa, at the southern entrance to the Red Sea. It is bounded on the north, west and south-west by Ethiopia, and on the south-east by Somalia. The land is volcanic desert and the climate hot and arid. There are two main ethnic groups, the Issa, who are of Somali origin and comprise 50% of the population, and the Afar, who comprise 40% of the population and are of Ethiopian origin. Both groups are Muslims, and they speak related Cushitic languages. The official languages are Arabic and French. The flag has two equal horizontal stripes, of blue and green, with a white triangle, enclosing a five-pointed red star, at the hoist. The capital is Djibouti.

Recent History

French involvement in the territory began in 1859 and centred on the port of Djibouti, whose position at the entrance to the Red Sea invests the country with its strategic importance and economic potential. In 1945 the area (then known as French Somaliland) was proclaimed an overseas territory, and in 1967 was renamed the French Territory of the Afars and the Issas. The Afars and the Issas have strong connections with Ethiopia and Somalia respectively.

In the late 1950s divisions between the two communities were not marked, the Issas dominating local politics through their greater numbers in the port, but in the 1960s conflicting interests in the Horn of Africa and the French policy of favouring the minority Afar community combined to reveal tensions in the Territory. Demands for independence were growing, and the violence which had been sporadic since 1967 brought matters to a head in 1975, when Ali Aref Bourhan, Vice-President of the Council of Ministers, lost the support of 13 of his deputies. International assurances to respect the rights of a free Djibouti ushered in negotiations for its independence.

Ali Aref resigned in July 1976, and it was finally agreed that a referendum on independence and elections to a new Chamber of Deputies would be held simultaneously in May 1977, and that independence would follow in June; all parties united to form the Rassemblement Populaire pour l'Indépendance, which became the Rassemblement Populaire pour le Progrès (RPP) in 1979.

The Territory voted overwhelmingly for independence in the referendum, while in the parallel elections to the Chamber of Deputies 77% of votes cast were in support of a single list of candidates. Hassan Gouled Aptidon was elected President and on 27 June 1977 Djibouti became independent.

The most important task facing the new state was that of resolving tensions between Afar and Issa. The first administration attempted to balance all ethnic and political interests but the Afars soon complained of discrimination and attacked the Government's pro-Somali policies; following the arrest of 600 Afars in December 1977, Ahmed Dini, the Prime Minister, and four other Afar Ministers resigned. A special Commission of Afars was created, and the President agreed to its demands for more Afar representation in the Government, the civil service and the armed forces, and the release of most Afar detainees. In February 1978 a new Cabinet with a careful tribal balance was announced, and in September Barkad Gourad Hamadou, a former Minister of Health, became Prime Minister and declared a policy of 'rapid detribalization'. Throughout 1979, however, the Afars continued to express discontent.

In February 1981 a law providing for the election of the President by universal suffrage was passed; President Gouled, the sole candidate, was subsequently re-elected in June. Other laws, passed in October, led to the establishment of a one-party state. Legislative elections were held in May 1982, when candidates were chosen from a single list approved by the RPP, and turn-out was 91%, indicating general approval of government policies. The new Government, formed in June, differed little from its predecessor.

Separate treaties of friendship and co-operation were signed in 1981 with Ethiopia, Somalia, Kenya and Sudan in an effort to begin the peace process in East Africa. In August 1984 the Minister of Foreign Affairs reaffirmed Djibouti's policy of maintaining a neutral stance in the conflict between its neighbours in the Horn of Africa, and expressed his Government's willingness to act as a mediator. In April 1984 a new scheme for repatriating Ethiopian refugees (estimated to number 35,000), under the aegis of the UNHCR, was begun. By December it was estimated that around 16,000 had returned to Ethiopia. Djibouti also suffered the effects of drought in 1984, and was granted US $215,000 in famine relief aid from the EEC.

Government

The Government is formed from the Chamber of Deputies, consisting of 65 members elected for five years by universal adult franchise. It comprises a Council of Ministers, presided over by a Prime Minister, and an elected President, to whom it is responsible. The Republic forms a single electoral district. Djibouti became a one-party state in October 1981.

Defence

Since French withdrawal, a large portion of the annual budget has been set aside for military expenditure, and defence costs were estimated at US $25m. in 1982. In July 1984 there were about 3,250 French soldiers stationed in Djibouti. The total armed forces of Djibouti itself numbered 2,700, and there was a paramilitary force of 2,100.

Economic Affairs

There is little arable farming. The land is volcanic desert, one of the least hospitable and productive terrains in Africa. More than one-half of the population are pastoral nomads, herding goats, sheep and camels. The development of underground water supplies for irrigation is being studied, and deep-water wells have been dug to combat the spells of drought. Agricultural and fisheries development schemes were under way in 1981.

Industry is limited to a few small-scale concerns. A mineral-bottling factory was opened in 1981 and a dairy plant was to be built. Several industry and infrastructure contracts, worth more than US $80m., were awarded in 1983, including one for the construction of a cement works in the capital, with an expected output of 100,000 metric tons per year. A geothermal exploration scheme was announced in 1984, funded by foreign aid, which should make Djibouti self-sufficient in gas and also enable it to export gas to neighbouring countries. Political uncertainty in the Horn of Africa has discouraged the creation of new industries, despite the existence of a free zone, and almost all consumer goods must be imported (mainly from France). Nevertheless, some economic diversification has taken place, and GDP rose by 3% annually in 1979–82, reversing the annual 2.7% decline in 1977–79. The 25,000 refugees from the Ogaden region of Ethiopia who are still in Djibouti represent a huge burden on the economy.

Djibouti's economic potential depends, at present, on its developing service economy, based on the expanding port, the modern airport, the Djibouti–Addis Ababa railway and the growing banking sector, which is aided by the freely convertible Djibouti franc and the absence of exchange controls. The war between Ethiopia and Somalia temporarily closed the railway, which carried about one-half of Ethiopia's foreign trade, thus threatening Djibouti's economic viability. Having suffered badly during the closure of the Suez Canal (1967–75), the port has also found it difficult to compete with the rising Arab ports nearby. Nevertheless, traffic increased by 10.3% in 1981. Djibouti was established as a free port in 1981. Landlocked African countries, including Uganda and Zaire, air-freight their goods to Djibouti for export. The main hope for the future is to develop Djibouti as a major entrepôt for trade between East Africa and the Arab countries. An international container terminal, capable of handling 40,000 metric tons per year, was expected to be operational by 1985.

Djibouti is dependent on foreign aid which, owing to its strategic position, is readily forthcoming, particularly from France and the Gulf states, as well as from the USA and Europe. This assistance, along with a surplus in services and transfers, means that Djibouti usually achieves a positive balance of payments (US $5.3m. in 1981). The Government's first Development Plan (1982–84) aimed to direct foreign aid into a co-ordinated development strategy. Development plans under way include the expansion of Djibouti's airport, modernization of the communications network, and an urban rehabilitation project for Djibouti town. In 1980 Djibouti became a member of the World Bank and of the International Finance Corporation.

Transport and Communications

There are more than 2,000 km of roads, of which about one-half are serviceable only during the dry season. The only railway in the Horn of Africa links the international port of Djibouti with Addis Ababa, the capital of neighbouring Ethiopia. About 100 km of this line lie within Djibouti. The country has an international airport at Ambouli, and there are six internal airports. There are plans to expand most transport facilities.

Social Welfare

In 1982 there were 11 hospital establishments, with a total of 1,239 beds, and 346 medical personnel, including 68 physicians.

Education

Since independence, the Government has assumed overall responsibility for education. Primary education generally begins at seven years of age and lasts for six years. Secondary education, usually starting at the age of 13, lasts for seven years. In 1983/84 there were 21,847 primary school pupils and 6,331 pupils at secondary schools.

Tourism

The Government is attempting to encourage tourists, aiming for 10,000 per year by 1985, the main attractions being the desert scenery of the interior and the potential for underwater sports on the coast. A 200-bed hotel was opened in November 1981, bringing the total of hotel rooms to 318.

Directory

The Constitution

In February 1981 the National Assembly approved the first constitutional laws controlling the election and terms of office of the President, who is elected by universal suffrage for six years and may serve no more than two terms. Candidates for the presidency must be presented by a regularly constituted political party and represented by at least 25 deputies.

Deputies are elected for five years from a single list of candidates proposed by the Rassemblement populaire pour le progrès.

In October 1984 a new constitutional bill was proposed, specifying that, when the post of President falls vacant, the President of the Supreme Court will assume the power of Head of State for a minimum of 20 days and a maximum of 35 days, during which period a new President shall be elected.

Laws approving the provisional establishment of a single-party system were passed in October 1981.

DOMINICA

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Commonwealth of Dominica is situated in the Windward Islands group of the West Indies, lying between Guadeloupe, to the north, and Martinique, to the south. The climate is tropical, though tempered by sea winds which often reach hurricane force, especially from July to September. The average temperature is about 27°C (80°F), with little seasonal variation. Rainfall is heavy, especially in the mountainous areas, where the annual average is 6,350 mm (250 inches), compared with 1,800 mm (70 inches) along the coast. English is the official language but a local French patois is also spoken. Almost all of the inhabitants profess Christianity, and about 80% are Roman Catholics. The national flag has a green field, with equal stripes of yellow, white and black forming an upright cross, on the centre of which is superimposed a red disc containing a parrot surrounded by ten five-pointed green stars (one for each of the island's parishes). The capital is Roseau.

Recent History

A British possession since the 18th century, Dominica formed part of the Leeward Islands federation until 1939. In 1940 it was transferred to the Windward Islands and remained attached to that group until the federal arrangement was ended in December 1959. Under a new constitution, effective from January 1960, Dominica (like each other member of the group) achieved a separate status, with its own Administrator and an enlarged Legislative Council. Dominica joined the newly formed West Indies Federation in January 1958 and remained a member until the Federation was dissolved in May 1962.

At the January 1961 elections to the Legislative Council, the ruling Dominica United People's Party was defeated by the Dominica Labour Party (DLP), formed from the People's National Movement and other groups. Edward LeBlanc, leader of the DLP, became Chief Minister. In March 1967 Dominica became one of the West Indies Associated States, gaining full autonomy in internal affairs, with the United Kingdom retaining responsibility for defence and foreign relations only. The Legislative Council was replaced by a House of Assembly, the Administrator became Governor and the Chief Minister was restyled Premier. At elections to the House in October 1970, the Labour Party was divided into two factions, one campaigning as the DLP and the other, led by the Premier, as the LeBlanc Labour Party. The Premier was returned to power and the DLP was subsequently reunited.

In July 1974 LeBlanc retired, being replaced as DLP leader and Premier by Patrick John, formerly Deputy Premier and Minister of Finance. Elections to an enlarged House of Assembly were held in March 1975, when the DLP was returned again, winning 16 of the 21 elective seats. Following a decision in 1975 by the Associated States to seek independence separately, Dominica became an independent republic within the Commonwealth on 3 November 1978. Frederick Degazon, formerly Speaker of the House of Assembly, became President, and Patrick John became Prime Minister.

In May 1979 two people were killed by the defence force at a demonstration against the Government's attempts to introduce legislation which would restrict the freedom of the trade unions and the press. The killings fuelled increasing popular opposition to the Government, and a Committee for National Salvation (CNS), formed to bring down the Government, demanded John's resignation. On his refusal, opponents of the Government organized a general strike which lasted 25 days, with John finally agreeing to hand over power to an interim President only after all his Cabinet ministers had resigned. Oliver Seraphin, the candidate proposed by the CNS, was elected Prime Minister, and an interim government was then formed to prepare for elections in six months.

Elections were eventually held in July 1980, when the Dominica Freedom Party (DFP) gained a convincing victory, winning 17 of the 21 elective seats in the House of Assembly. Eugenia Charles, the party's leader, became the Caribbean's first woman Prime Minister. Both Patrick John, who contested the elections as leader of the DLP, and Oliver Seraphin, who stood as leader of the newly formed Democratic Labour Party (DEMLAB), lost their seats. The DFP's victory was attributed to its continued integrity, while the DLP and DEMLAB had suffered from major political scandals.

Fears for the island's security dominated 1981. In January the Government disarmed the defence force as a result of reports that weapons were being traded for marijuana. There were shooting incidents between police and Rastafarians in February, and the Government declared a state of emergency after murders and kidnapping had risen to an unacceptable level. In March a plot to overthrow the Government, with the aid of US mercenaries, was uncovered, implicating former Prime Minister Patrick John and the two most senior officers in the defence force, who were all gaoled pending trial. The state of emergency was lifted in August, only to be reinstated in January 1982, following a second attempted coup in December 1981. This second plot involved an unsuccessful attempt to free Patrick John from prison. In June 1982 John and his fellow prisoners were tried and acquitted but, owing to the Government's continued opposition to this verdict, they were to be retried, a decision which John was challenging. The state of emergency, lifted in May 1982, was reinstated for a further year from January 1983. After his release in June 1982, John attempted to form a new left-wing coalition party, and in 1983 a new DLP was formed upon its reunification with DEMLAB, with Seraphin as leader and John as deputy leader. They hoped that this combination, together with other opposition parties, would provide a united left group which would be capable of winning the next elections, due to be held before October 1985.

Dominica has close foreign policy links with the USA and France. France helped in putting down the coup attempts against the DFP government, and Dominica was the first Commonwealth country to benefit from the French aid agency, FAC. In October 1983 Dominica, as a member of OECS (see page 113), contributed a small contingent to the US-backed invasion of Grenada.

Government

Dominica is a republic. Legislative power is vested in the unicameral House of Assembly, containing 30 members (nine nominated and 21 elected for five years by universal adult suffrage). Executive authority is vested in the President, elected by the House, but in most matters the President is guided by the advice of the Cabinet and acts as a constitutional Head of State. He appoints the Prime Minister, who must be able to command a majority in the House, and (on the Prime Minister's recommendation) other Ministers. The Cabinet is responsible to the House.

Defence

The Dominican Defence Force was officially disbanded in April 1981. There is a police force of about 250 and a coastguard service, which received a patrol boat from the USA in 1983.

Economic Affairs

Agriculture is the principal economic activity, and bananas are the main crop. In 1978 bananas accounted for 70% of exports and 20% of GNP, but hurricane damage in 1979 virtually stopped all production. Regular shipments to the United Kingdom, the principal recipient, recommenced in April 1981 and production reached 26,800 tons in 1982, accounting for 44.1% of exports. In 1983 26,165 tons were exported, creating revenue of EC $30.3m. Strong winds in August 1984 caused the loss of 25% of the total banana acreage. Other important crops include coconuts (which provide copra for export as well as edible oil and soap), limes and other citrus fruits. Plans were made in 1983 to revitalize the lime industry, with TT $3.49m. from the Caribbean Food Corporation, both to improve processing and to modernize cultivation methods. Dominica also exports bay oil, and hopes to export patchouli oil.

There is a small amount of livestock but this is reared mainly for domestic consumption. Fishing is a traditional occupation for the islanders and a number of co-operatives have been established to provide vessels and equipment to fishermen on a hire basis. Quarrying of pumice was suspended in 1974 but resumed in 1977. Attempts are being made to exploit Dominica's extensive timber reserves, to provide lumber for export, prefabricated houses, and to supply furniture manufacturers.

An Industrial Development Corporation was established in 1974 to promote and encourage the growth of new industries on the island, and to diversify the island's economic base. The 1983/84 budget proposed continued expansion of industrial estates; investment in plant and equipment was put at EC $23.8m. There are factories for the manufacture and refining of crude and edible vegetable oils and for the production of cigarettes, canned juices and soaps. Soaps accounted for 38% of domestic products in 1982. Dominica is now using its own plentiful reserves of water to export to other drier Caribbean islands, such as Aruba, in return for money to help improve water supply infrastructure. Dominica generates more than 75% of its electricity by means of hydroelectric power stations.

The island's crops and infrastructure are still recovering from the destruction of successive hurricanes in 1979 and 1980. Reconstruction is taking place with aid from an international consortium of aid donors and loans from international organizations. Particular emphasis was placed on road reconstruction, which received the largest single share (EC $52.4m.) of the 1983/84 budget. A loan of EC $37m. was secured from the IMF for balance-of-payments support for the period 1981–84, and a further SDR 1.4m. standby credit was approved in 1984.

Tourism is not as developed as in many of the other Caribbean islands, but numbers of visitors had grown to 33,000 in 1982, contributing EC $4m. to the economy.

Inflation, running at 17% in 1980, was down to 4.1% in 1983. Unemployment also fell, from 21% in 1980 to 15% in 1982. The current budget deficit declined from EC $17.1m. in 1980/81 to $5.4m. in 1981/82, and the budget was expected to produce a surplus of $3m. in 1984/85. GDP grew by about 3.5% in real terms during 1982/83, and was expected to rise further. The trade deficit was reduced to EC $47.5m. for 1983, from $82.3m. in 1981, as export earnings increased to $72.2m. from $61.5m. in 1982.

Transport and Communications

There is no railway system and all internal traffic is carried by road. In 1976 Dominica had 752 km (467 miles) of motorable roads. Despite hurricane damage and extensive flooding in 1979 and 1980, most of the roads were operational in 1982. The World Bank loaned Dominica US $5m. to repair 320 km in 1982, and EC $52.4m. was allotted to reconstruction in the 1983/84 budget. A deep-water harbour is sited at Roseau and a smaller harbour at Portsmouth. There is an airport at Melville Hall, 64 km (40 miles) from Roseau, and a small landing strip at Canefield, a few miles outside Roseau.

Social Welfare

There are main hospitals at Roseau and Portsmouth, with 242 and 50 beds respectively, and two cottage hospitals, at Marigot and Grand Bay. There are 44 health centres, located throughout the island. In 1978 there were only 10 physicians working in Dominica.

Education

Education is free and is provided by a mixture of government and denominational schools. There are also a number of schools catering for the mentally and physically handicapped. Education is compulsory for 10 years between five and 15 years of age. Primary education begins at the age of five and lasts for seven years. Secondary education, beginning at 12 years of age, also lasts for seven years, comprising a first cycle of five years and a second of two years. A teacher training college provides further education, and there is also a branch of the University of the West Indies on the island. Adult illiteracy was only 5.9% in 1970.

Tourism

Despite its many natural attractions, Dominica has never achieved the tourist success of its neighbours, and the effects of two recent hurricanes temporarily hampered the growth experienced in 1978. The Government has designated areas of the island as nature reserves to ensure that there will always be areas of natural beauty to attract visitors.

Directory

The Constitution

The Constitution came into effect at the independence of Dominica on 3 November 1978.

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

The Constitution guarantees the rights of life, liberty, security of the person, the protection of the law and respect for private property. The individual is entitled to freedom of conscience, of expression and assembly and has the right to an existence free from slavery, forced labour and torture. Protection against discrimination on the grounds of sex, race, place of origin, political opinion, colour or creed is assured.

THE PRESIDENT

The President is elected by the House of Assembly for a term of five years. A presidential candidate is nominated jointly by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition and on their concurrence is declared elected without any vote being taken; in the case of disagreement the choice will be made by secret ballot in the House of Assembly. Candidates must be citizens of Dominica aged at least 40 who have been resident in Dominica for five years prior to their nomination. A President may not hold office for more than two terms.

PARLIAMENT

Parliament consists of the President and the House of Assembly, composed of 21 elected Representatives and nine Senators. According to the wishes of Parliament, the latter may be appointed by the President—five on the advice of the Prime Minister and four on the advice of the Leader of the Opposition—or elected. The life of Parliament is five years.

Parliament has the power to amend the constitution. Each constituency returns one Representative to the House who is directly elected in accordance with the constitution. Every citizen over the age of 18 is eligible to vote.

THE EXECUTIVE

Executive authority is vested in the President. The President appoints as Prime Minister the elected member of the House who commands the support of a majority of its elected members, and other Ministers on the advice of the Prime Minister. Not more than three Ministers may be from among the appointed Senators. The President has the power to remove the Prime Minister from office if a resolution of 'no confidence' in the Government is passed by the House and the Prime Minister does not resign within three days or advise the President to dissolve Parliament.

The Cabinet consists of the Prime Minister, other Ministers and the Attorney-General in an ex officio capacity.

The Leader of the Opposition is appointed by the President as that elected member of the house who, in the President's judgement, is best able to command the support of a majority of the elected members who do not support the Government.

THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Dominican Republic occupies the eastern part of the island of Hispaniola, which lies between Cuba and Puerto Rico in the Caribbean Sea. The country's only international frontier is with Haiti, to the west. The climate is sub-tropical, with an average annual temperature of 27°C (80°F). In Santo Domingo, temperatures are generally between 19°C (66°F) and 31°C (88°F). The west and south-west of the country are arid. Hispaniola lies in the path of tropical cyclones. The official language is Spanish. Almost all of the inhabitants profess Christianity, and more than 90% are Roman Catholics. There are small Protestant and Jewish communities. The national flag (proportions 23 by 15) is blue (upper hoist and lower fly) and red (lower hoist and upper fly), quartered by a white cross. The state flag has, in addition, the national coat of arms at the centre of the cross. The capital is Santo Domingo.

Recent History

The Dominican Republic became independent in 1844, although it was occupied by US military forces between 1916 and 1924. General Rafael Trujillo Molina overthrew the elected President, Horacio Vázquez, in 1930 and dominated the country until his assassination in May 1961. The dictator ruled personally from 1930 to 1947 and indirectly thereafter. His brother, Héctor Trujillo, was President from 1947 until August 1960, when he was replaced by Dr Joaquín Balaguer, hitherto Vice-President. After Rafael Trujillo's death, President Balaguer remained in office, but in December 1961 he permitted moderate opposition groups to participate in a Council of State, with legislative and executive powers. Balaguer resigned in January 1962, when the Council of State became the Provisional Government. A presidential election in December 1962, the country's first free election for 38 years, was won by Juan Bosch Gaviño, the founder and leader of the Partido Revolucionario Dominicano (PRD), who had been in exile since 1930. President Bosch, a left-of-centre democrat, took office in February 1963 but was overthrown in the following September by a military coup. The leaders of the armed forces transferred power to a civilian triumvirate, led by Emilio de los Santos. In April 1965 a revolt by supporters of ex-President Bosch overthrew the triumvirate. Civil war broke out between pro-Bosch forces and military units headed by Gen. Elías Wessin y Wessin, who had played a leading role in the 1963 coup. The violence was eventually suppressed by the intervention of some 23,000 US troops, who were formally incorporated into an Inter-American peace force by the Organization of American States after they had landed. The peace force withdrew in September 1965.

Following a period of provisional government under Héctor García Godoy, a presidential election in June 1966 was won by ex-President Balaguer, the candidate of the Partido Reformista (PR), who won 57% of the votes cast, while ex-President Bosch won 39%. The PR, founded in 1964, also won a majority of seats in both houses of the National Congress. President Balaguer took office in July. A new constitution was promulgated in November 1966. Despite his association with the Trujillo dictatorship, Balaguer initially proved to be a popular leader, and in May 1970 he was re-elected for a further four years. In February 1973 a state of emergency was declared when guerrilla forces landed on the coast. Captain Francisco Caamaño Deño, the leader of the 1965 revolt, and his followers were killed. Bosch and other opposition figures went into hiding. Bosch later resigned as leader of the PRD, undermining hopes of a united opposition in the May 1974 elections, when President Balaguer was re-elected with a large majority. In June 1975 guerrilla forces of Dominican émigrés from Cuba landed on the island in an unsuccessful attempt to overthrow Balaguer.

In the May 1978 presidential election, Dr Balaguer was defeated by the PRD candidate, Silvestre Antonio Guzmán Fernández. This was the first occasion in the country's history when an elected President yielded power to an elected successor. An attempted military coup in favour of Dr Balaguer was prevented by pressure from the US Government. On assuming office in August, President Guzmán undertook to professionalize the armed forces by removing politically ambitious high-ranking officers. In June 1981 he declared his support for Jacobo Majluta Azar, his Vice-President, as his successor but in November the PRD rejected Majluta's candidacy in favour of Dr Salvador Jorge Blanco, a left-wing senator, who was elected President in May 1982. In the Congressional elections, held at the same time, the PRD gained a majority in both the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies. President Guzmán committed suicide in July after allegations of fraud were made against his government and members of his family. Vice-President Majluta was immediately sworn in as interim President until Dr Blanco assumed office in August. Although a member of the Socialist International, Blanco maintained good relations with the USA (on which the country is economically dependent) and declared that he would not resume relations with Cuba. In December 1982 the Government revealed that it would not nationalize foreign property, including extensive holdings owned by oil companies, in the Dominican Republic.

In 1983 popular discontent with the Government's austerity programme led to the occupation of the Ministry of Agriculture by peasants, and calls for agrarian reform. In August 1983 a two-week purge of subversives took place on the orders of President Blanco. Two visiting Cuban academics were deported, and Socialist and Communist Party sympathizers were arrested. The Government's move came in response to a report which implicated Cuban and Nicaraguan involvement in the increased left-wing activity in the country.

In April 1984 a series of public protests against substantial increases in the cost of essential items erupted into violent confrontations between government forces and demonstrators in Santo Domingo and four other cities, which lasted for three days. In the course of the protests, more than 50 people were killed, some 200 injured and over 4,000 arrested. The Government held opposition groups of the extreme right and left responsible for the unrest. In May the Government responded to the prospect of further demonstrations by ordering the arrest of more than 100 trade union and left-wing leaders. In August, in anticipation of civil unrest at the announcement of new price increases, more arrests were made among trade union and opposition leaders. Rumours of a plot against the Government by left-wing sympathizers caused serious disquiet throughout the country. In November a new Secretary of State for Finance was named for the second time in 1984, the previous change having been made in May. Further demonstrations, including one attended by 40,000 people in Santo Domingo, were held in protest at the continuing economic decline, which appeared unlikely to be reversed in 1985.

Government

The Dominican Republic comprises 26 provinces, each administered by an appointed governor, and a Distrito Nacional (DN) containing the capital. Under the 1966 Constitution, legislative power is exercised by the bicameral National Congress, with a Senate of 27 members (one for each province and one for the DN) and a Chamber of Deputies (120 members). Members of both houses are elected for four years by universal adult suffrage. Executive power lies with the President, who is also elected by direct popular vote for four years. He is assisted by a Cabinet containing Secretaries of State. In the event of the President's absence, the President of the Supreme Court of Justice acts as Vice-President.

Defence

Military service is voluntary and lasts for four years. In July 1984 the armed forces totalled 23,000 men: army 14,000, air force 4,500 and navy 4,500. Paramilitary forces number 10,000. Defence expenditure for 1983 was RD $129.3m.

Economic Affairs

Between 1968 and 1974 the annual increase in the Dominican Republic's gross domestic product (GDP) averaged 10.6% in real terms, one of the highest growth rates in the world. Over the same period, GDP per head grew by 7.4% annually. However, the country is dependent on fuel imports to meet its energy requirements, and in the later 1970s, following sharp rises in the world price of petroleum, its economic progress was slower. Between 1975 and 1979 GDP rose by 4.4% per year, with GDP per head growing at an average annual rate of 1.5%. In 1982, according to estimates by the World Bank, the Dominican Republic's gross national product per head (at average 1980–82 prices) was US $1,330, having increased at an average rate of 3.2% per year, in constant prices, since 1960.

Agriculture employs more than 50% of the working population, and agricultural products provide about 75% of export earnings. The principal commercial crop is sugar cane, and sugar accounts for about 40% of the value of total exports. In 1982/83 earnings from sugar amounted to US $300m. Output of raw sugar in 1982/83 totalled 1.2m. metric tons. However, the outlook was poor as the price had dropped to below the cost of production, earnings fell by 43% between 1981 and 1982, and the USA subsequently introduced tariffs on sugar imports. Exports of sugar to the USA declined from 686,071 metric tons in 1981 to 529,992 tons in 1983. In 1983 the industry received an IMF loan of $13.2m. to assist with the financing of sugar inventories. The sector suffered a setback in June 1984, when Gulf and Western, the major private sugar company (accounting for about one-third of national sugar output), announced its intention to cease operations and to sell its property. The Government has encouraged the cultivation of coffee and cocoa in order to diversify exports, and tobacco and bananas are also grown. In 1983 loans of $1,000m. were secured from the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) to aid agricultural producers and small business concerns. The agricultural sector is highly vulnerable, suffering from the loss of the entire pig population after an outbreak of African swine fever in 1978, from damage (estimated at $1,000m.) inflicted by Hurricane David in 1979, from further weather hazards in 1981, and from declines in world prices for coffee, cocoa and tobacco in 1980 and for sugar in 1981 and 1984.

The principal mineral products are bauxite (with reserves of 18m. tons at Cabo Rojo), gold, silver and ferro-nickel. A fall in world demand for these products led to a decline in the mining sector of 10% between 1981 and 1983. In 1984 the US company Alcoa announced plans to cease its mining activities. Foreign oil companies have been granted concessions to undertake exploratory drilling, and in 1981 a petroleum deposit was discovered at Charco Largo, Barahona. Its potential output was estimated at 20,000 barrels per day, about one-half of national consumption. In 1981 about 50% of total export earnings were used for imports of petroleum, which grew by 11% and accounted for 92% of electricity production. In 1984 the Government announced plans to barter sugar and bauxite in exchange for petroleum from Venezuela. In 1984 the IDB provided financing of US $11m. for petroleum exploration. Attempts were being made to find alternative energy sources, and hydroelectricity is now being developed. In 1983 a hydroelectric generator with a capacity of 40,000 kW became operational at the Tavera dam. The hydroelectric plant, Niza II, is to start operations in 1986 with an annual production capacity of 28m. kWh. In 1981 construction began of the 125 MW station at Haina, the first coal-fired plant in the Caribbean.

Between 1969 and 1976 great economic progress was made, mainly owing to massive US aid, the high level of world sugar prices, substantial public and private investment and increased foreign participation. Government investment has been concentrated on agriculture, energy and tourism. In 1983 tourism generated foreign exchange income equal to 43% of total export receipts, and therefore surpassed earnings from sugar. In 1980 the Sabana Yegua dam, designed to irrigate 600,000 ha of land, was opened. The Government also undertook to develop the Madrigal water supply project for Santo Domingo, and the Río Nizao irrigation project.

After the hurricane disaster in 1979, the Government attempted to achieve economic recovery through a high level of public expenditure, and added 50,000 employees to the government payroll. By preventing growth of the money supply in 1981, inflation was reduced to 10% but GDP growth was down to 3.5% and fell to 1.5% in 1982. The budget deficit was US $183m. in 1982, and the current deficit on the balance of payments was expected to be $562m. in 1983. Falling earnings from the narrow range of raw material and commodity exports resulted in a severe shortage of convertible currency. In 1983 a three-year loan of $466m. was agreed with the IMF, whose conditions were expected to bring about currency devaluation, higher inflation and an increase in unemployment. In early 1984 the disbursement of some US $70m. (including $40m. from the IMF) was halted, pending the Dominican Republic's fulfilment of the IMF's conditions, principally the introduction of a unified exchange rate for the peso. Acceptance of the IMF's conditions would have enabled the Government to obtain $800m. in loans from creditor banks for servicing the foreign debt, in addition to $221m. in emergency aid from the US Government. In April 1984 the Government introduced price increases of over 80% on basic items and of 300% on import tariffs. In May, however, negotiations with the IMF were broken off after the Government rejected the IMF's austerity programme. The principal issue of contention had been the IMF's insistence upon an immediate transfer of all imports to the 'parallel' exchange rate of 2.97 pesos per US dollar, to allow for an increase of between 20% and 300% in the cost of petroleum products and electricity. Negotiations were resumed, and in August agreement was reached on an interim loan. In September the Government imposed increases in the cost of petroleum products. In addition, a three-month 'freeze' on the cost of basic consumer goods was announced. In 1985 the Government planned to renegotiate $576m. of debts with its foreign government and commercial bank creditors.

In 1984 unemployment stood at 29%, not including 30% under-employment. Inflation was 7.4% in 1984. In 1982 the new Government introduced 125 emergency economic measures as part of a fiscal reform programme, aimed at cutting the public sector deficit of $330m., and at achieving a current payments surplus by 1984/85. Among the measures to be enforced were a one-year 'freeze' on wages and prices of basic commodities, import restrictions, including a ban on the import of passenger vehicles, and tax increases. The Government was also considering a 30% reduction in the number of public employees. In July 1983 the Government announced its Public Investment Programme for 1983–85, providing $1,666.2m. in funding for 412 projects.

In 1984 the Government hoped to receive US $84.6m. in aid from the US Government's Caribbean Basin Initiative. In July 1984 the Dominican Republic was granted observer status in CARICOM (see p. 112).

Transport and Communications

Transport facilities are limited, and about 80% of the railways are used solely to carry sugar from the plantations. Roads, totalling 12,297 km in 1983, are the main means of communication and the network includes some modern motorways. There is no inland waterway system and very little coastal shipping. A number of shipping lines link the island with the USA and with other Caribbean islands. There are four international and several domestic airports.

Social Welfare

A voluntary national contributory scheme, introduced in 1947, provides insurance cover for sickness, unemployment, accidental injury, maternity, old age and death. Only 42% of the population are thought to benefit from the system. In 1980 there were 571 hospitals and clinics, 2,142 physicians and 8,953 hospital beds under the auspices of the public health and welfare department and the Institute of Social Security.

Education

Education is, where possible, compulsory for children between seven and 14 years of age. Primary education begins at the age of seven and lasts for six years. Secondary education, starting at 13 years of age, also lasts for six years, comprising a first cycle of two years and a second of four years. In 1981 the total enrolment at primary and secondary schools was equivalent to 77% of children in the relevant age-group. There are five universities. In 1983 the estimated rate of adult illiteracy was 23%. It is thought that 66% of children attending primary school do not complete their education.

Tourism

Strenuous efforts are being made to develop the tourist industry. Hotels, casinos and seaside resorts are being built, and tours to the old Spanish colonial settlements have been organized. It was planned to spend RD $150m. on a tourism development programme, to be completed in 1985. Tourist complexes are under construction at Puerto Plata, Samana, La Romana, La Altagracia and Santiago de los Caballeros. In 1982 the Dominican Republic received 598,581 visitors.

The Constitution

The present constitution of the Dominican Republic was promulgated on 28 November 1966. Its main provisions are summarized below:

The Dominican Republic is a sovereign, free, independent State; no organizations set up by the State can bring about any act which might cause direct or indirect intervention in the internal or foreign affairs of the State or which might threaten the integrity of the State. The Dominican Republic recognizes and applies the norms of general and American international law and is in favour of and will support any initiative towards economic integration for the countries of America. The civil, republican, democratic, representative Government is divided into three independent powers: legislative, executive and judicial.

The territory of the Dominican Republic is as laid down in the Frontier Treaty of 1929 and its Protocol of Revision of 1936.

The life and property of the individual citizen are inviolable; there can be no sentence of death, torture nor any sentence which might cause physical harm to the individual. There is freedom of thought, of conscience, of religion, freedom to publish, freedom of unarmed association, provided that there is no subversion against public order, national security or decency. There is freedom of labour and trade unions; freedom to strike, except in the case of public services, according to the dispositions of the law.

The State will set about agrarian reform, dedicating the land to useful interests and gradually eliminating the latifundios (large estates). The State will do all in its power to support all aspects of family life. Primary education is compulsory and all education is free. Social security services will be developed. Every Dominican has the duty to give what civil and military service the State may require. Every legally entitled citizen must exercise the right to vote, i.e. all persons over 18 years of age and all who are or have been married even if they are not yet 18.

GOVERNMENT

Legislative power is exercised by Congress which is made up of the Senate and Chamber of Deputies, elected by direct vote. Senators, one for each province and one for the Distrito Nacional, are elected for four years; they must be Dominicans in full exercise of their citizen's rights, and over 25. Their duties are to elect judges, the President and other members of the Electoral and Accounts Councils, and to approve the nomination of diplomats. Deputies, one for every 50,000 inhabitants or fraction over 25,000 in each province and the Distrito Nacional, are elected for four years and must fulfil the same conditions for election as Senators.

Decisions of Congress are taken by absolute majority of at least half the members of each house; urgent matters require a two-thirds majority. Both houses normally meet on 27 February and 16 August each year for sessions of 90 days, which can be extended for a further 60 days.

Executive power is exercised by the President of the Republic, who is elected by direct vote for a four-year term. The President must be a Dominican citizen by birth or origin, over 30 years of age and in full exercise of citizen's rights; must not have engaged in any active military or police service for at least a year prior to election. The President takes office on 16 August following election. The President of the Republic is Head of the Public Administration and Supreme Chief of the armed forces and police forces. The President's duties include nominating Secretaries and Assistant Secretaries of State and other public officials, promulgating and publishing laws and resolutions of Congress and seeing to their faithful execution, watching over the collection and just investment of national income, nominating, with the approval of the Senate, members of the Diplomatic Corps, receiving foreign Heads of State, presiding at national functions, decreeing a State of Siege or Emergency or any other measures necessary during a public crisis. The President may not leave the country for more than 15 days without authorization from Congress. In the absence of the President, the President of the Supreme Court of Justice will assume power.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Government in the Distrito Nacional and the Municipalities is in the hands of local councils, with members elected proportionally to the number of inhabitants, but numbering at least five. Each Province has a civil Governor, designated by the Executive.

JUDICIARY

Judicial power is exercised by the Supreme Court of Justice and the other Tribunals; no judicial official may hold another public office or employment, other than honorary or teaching. The Supreme Court is made up of at least nine judges, who must be Dominican citizens by birth or origin, at least 35 years old, in full exercise of their citizen's rights, graduates in law and have practised professionally for at least 12 years. There are also five Courts of Appeal, a Lands Tribunal and a Court of the First Instance in each judicial district; in each Municipality and in the Distrito Nacional there are also Justices of the Peace.

Elections are directed by the Central Electoral Council. The armed forces are essentially obedient and apolitical, created for the defence of national independence and the maintenance of public order and the Constitution and Laws.

The artistic and historical riches of the country, whoever owns them, are part of the cultural heritage of the country and are under the safe-keeping of the State. Mineral deposits belong to the State. There is freedom to form political parties, provided they conform to the principles laid down in the Constitution. Justice is administered without charge throughout the Republic.

This Constitution can be reformed if the proposal for reform is supported in Congress by one-third of the members of either house or by the Executive. A special session of Congress must be called and any resolutions must have a two-thirds majority. There can be no reform of the method of government, which must always be civil, republican, democratic and representative.

ECUADOR

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Ecuador lies on the west coast of South America. It is bordered by Colombia to the north, by Peru to the east and south, and by the Pacific Ocean to the west. The Galapagos Islands, about 1,000 km (600 miles) offshore, form part of Ecuador. The climate is affected by the Andes mountains, and the topography ranges from the tropical rain forest on the coast and in the eastern region to the tropical grasslands of the central valley and the permanent snowfields of the highlands. The official language is Spanish, but Quechua and other indigenous languages are very common. Almost all of the inhabitants profess Christianity, and about 90% are Roman Catholics. The national flag (proportions 2 by 1) has three horizontal stripes, of yellow (one-half of the depth), blue and red. The state flag has, in addition, the national emblem (an oval cartouche, showing Mt Chimborazo and a steamer on a lake, surmounted by a condor) in the centre. The capital is Quito.

Recent History

Ecuador was ruled by Spain from the 16th century until 1822, when it achieved independence as part of Gran Colombia. In 1830 Ecuador seceded and became a separate republic. A long-standing division between Conservatives (Partido Conservador), whose support is generally strongest in the highlands, and Liberals (Partido Liberal, subsequently Partido Liberal Radical), based in the coastal region, began in the 19th century. Until 1948 Ecuador's political life was characterized by a rapid succession of presidents, dictators and juntas. Between 1830 and 1925 the country was governed by 40 different regimes. From 1925 to 1948 there was even greater instability, with a total of 22 heads of state.

Dr Galo Plaza Lasso, who was elected in 1948 and remained in power until 1952, was the first President since 1924 to complete his term of office. He created a climate of stability and economic progress. Dr José María Velasco Ibarra, who had previously been President in 1934–35 and 1944–47, was elected again in 1952 and held office until 1956. A 61-year-old tradition of Liberal Presidents was broken in 1956, when a Conservative candidate, Dr Camilo Ponce Enríquez, was elected in June (though with only 29% of the votes cast) and took office in September. He was succeeded in September 1960 by ex-President Velasco, who campaigned as a non-party Liberal. In November 1961, however, President Velasco was deposed by a coup, and was succeeded by his Vice-President, Dr Carlos Julio Arosemena Monroy. The latter was himself deposed in July 1963 by a military junta, led by Capt. (later Rear-Adm.) Ramón Castro Jijón, the Commander-in-Chief of the Navy, who assumed the office of President. In March 1966 the High Command of the Armed Forces dismissed the junta and installed Clemente Yerovi Indaburu, a wealthy businessman and a former Minister of Economics, as acting President. Yerovi was forced to resign when the Constituent Assembly, elected in October 1966, proposed a new constitution which prohibited the intervention of the armed forces in politics. In November he was replaced as provisional President by Dr Otto Arosemena Gómez, who held office until the elections of June 1968, when Dr Velasco returned from exile to win the Presidency for the fifth time. He took office in September.

In June 1970 President Velasco, with the support of the army, suspended the constitution, dissolved the National Congress and assumed dictatorial powers to cope with a financial emergency. In February 1972 he was overthrown for the fourth time by a military coup, led by Brig.-Gen. Guillermo Rodríguez Lara, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, who proclaimed himself Head of State. In January 1976 President Rodríguez resigned, and power was assumed by a three-man military junta, led by Vice-Adm. Alfredo Poveda Burbano, the Chief of Staff of the Navy. The new junta announced its intention to lead the country to a truly representative democracy. A national referendum approved a newly-drafted constitution in January 1978 and presidential elections took place in July. No candidate achieved an overall majority, and a second round of voting was held in April 1979, when a new Congress was also elected. Jaime Roldós Aguilera of the Concentración de Fuerzas Populares (CFP) was elected President and he took office in August, when the Congress was inaugurated and the new constitution came into force. President Roldós promised social justice and economic development, and guaranteed freedom for the press, but he met antagonism from both the conservative sections of the Congress and the trade unions. In May 1981 the President died in an air crash and was replaced by the Vice-President, Dr Osvaldo Hurtado Larrea, who faced opposition from left-wing politicians and unions for his efforts to cut government spending. He was also opposed by right-wing and commercial interests, which feared encroaching state intervention in the private economic sector.

A dispute between Hurtado and Vice-President León Roldós Aguilera in January 1982 led to the resignation of two Ministers belonging to Roldós' party, Pueblo, Cambio y Democracia (PCD), which then went into opposition. Hurtado replaced the Ministers with members of the CFP, creating a new pro-government majority with a coalition of members of Democracia Popular-Unión Demócrata Cristiana, CFP, Izquierda Democrática and seven independents. The heads of the armed forces resigned and the Defence Minister was dismissed in January 1982, when they opposed Hurtado's attempts to settle amicably the border dispute with Peru (see below). In August Hurtado lost his majority again when two CFP Ministers resigned over energy policy. A state of emergency was declared in October, after a general strike and violent demonstrations against price rises, but it was lifted in November. From October 1982 to January 1983 Ecuador suffered extremely heavy rainfall and flooding, which resulted in loss of life (landslides claimed over 100 victims), extensive damage to agriculture and devastation of property. A state of emergency was declared in Quito.

In March 1983 the Government introduced a series of austerity measures, which encountered immediate opposition from the trade unions and workers in the private sector. A 48-hour general strike was called. During the ensuing demonstrations, one person was killed and 50 injured, but the Government succeeded in bringing the situation under control. A number of Ministers resigned in July, and a new Cabinet was appointed in August. Discontent with the Government's performance was reflected in the results of the concurrent presidential and general elections of January 1984, when the ruling party, Democracia Popular-Unión Demócrata Cristiana, lost support. Seventeen political parties contested the elections. Of the nine presidential candidates competing for votes, the two leading contenders were León Febres Cordero, leader of the Partido Social Cristiano and candidate of the conservative Frente de Reconstrucción Nacional, and Rodrigo Borja, representing the left-wing Izquierda Democrática. As neither candidate won an absolute majority a second round of voting was held in May 1984. After an often acrimonious campaign, Febres Cordero unexpectedly won the second round, securing 52.2% of the votes cast.

After taking office in August, President Febres Cordero reaffirmed his commitment to his campaign promise of 'bread, roofs and jobs' and announced his plans for renewed economic prosperity, which was to be achieved by the expansion of the private sector and the imposition of austerity measures. The President's policies were expected to encounter strong resistance in Congress, where a loose coalition of left-wing parties formed the majority grouping.

In September a serious constitutional dispute concerning the appointments procedure for the Supreme Court broke out between the Government and Congress. Following violent confrontations in Congress and fears of a coup, both the Government and Congress made appointments to the Supreme Court. As a result of the ensuing impasse, proceedings in both Congress and the Supreme Court came to a halt. In spite of the establishment of a bipartite commission to restructure the Supreme Court, the two sides remained in conflict. In November President Febres Cordero proposed that a referendum be held to resolve the issue.

In March 1984 a state of emergency was declared for 11 days in two northern provinces, following unrest and acts of sabotage by workers in the petroleum industry. In October a 24-hour general strike was called by the Frente Unitario de Trabajadores (FUT) and opposition groups, to protest against the restrictions on press freedom and the austerity measures that had been imposed by the new Government. In January 1985 a 48-hour general strike was called by the opposition after the Government announced increases in the cost of petroleum products and public transport. In the course of public demonstrations, seven people were killed and more than 100 were arrested.

The long-standing border dispute with Peru over the Cordillera del Cóndor erupted into war in January 1981. A ceasefire was declared a few days later under the auspices of the guarantors of the Rio Protocol of 1942 (Argentina, Brazil, Chile and the USA). The Protocol was not recognized by Ecuador as it awarded the area, which affords access to the Amazon river system, to Peru. Further clashes occurred along the border with Peru in December 1982 and January 1983. In addition, skirmishes between Ecuadorean and Colombian forces were reported to have taken place in the border zone in December 1982.

Government

Ecuador comprises 20 provinces, including the Galapagos Islands. Each province has a Governor, who is appointed by the President. Executive power is vested in the President, while legislative power is held by the unicameral Congress. The President and the Congress are both directly elected by universal adult suffrage for a four-year term. The President is not eligible for re-election. In April 1980 the future formation of an upper chamber was agreed.

Defence

Military service, which lasts two years, is selective for men at the age of 20. In July 1984 there were 39,300 men in the armed forces: army 30,000, navy 4,500 (including 1,000 marines) and air force 4,800. Defence expenditure for 1983 was 7,898m. sucres.

Economic Affairs

Until the exploitation of petroleum in 1972, Ecuador's main source of wealth was agriculture. In 1983 the leading agricultural exports were bananas (of which Ecuador is the world's leading exporter), coffee, hemp and cocoa. African palm, rice and other grains are also grown. The agricultural sector grew by 3% in 1980 and by 4.4% in 1982. In 1981 crop production increased by 2.1% and livestock by 5%. Coffee production rose by 10,000 bags (each of 60 kg) but output of cocoa and bananas fell as a result of low world prices. Despite a refining capacity of 130,000 metric tons, cocoa production decreased from 97,000 tons in 1982 to 60,000 tons in 1983.

The severe weather of late 1982 not only caused damage amounting to 3,000m. sucres but also had a devastating impact upon agriculture. The soya and cotton crops were cut by 50%, and banana production by 40%, with a loss in revenue of US $73m. predicted for 1983. Agricultural production in the coastal region fell by 32% as a result of rain damage, and the newly-developed activity of poultry farming in Manabí province was destroyed at a cost of $15m. In 1983 total agricultural production fell by 30%. The production of raw sugar in 1983 was estimated to be between 150,000 and 170,000 tons, about 100,000 tons below the annual average. In order to meet internal demand, the Government was obliged to import the shortfall.

Fishing has benefited considerably from official development programmes, and the total catch was a record 687,200 metric tons in 1981. However, the industry later experienced problems, and in the first six months of 1983 exports declined by 13.2%. The industry has been particularly affected by the adverse presence in the Pacific Ocean of the warm water current known as El Niño. The shrimp industry has continued to thrive and generated earnings of US $175m. in 1983. The industry underwent cumulative growth of 314% between 1979 and 1983, and shrimps now constitute Ecuador's fourth most important export. Ecuador's extensive forests yield valuable hardwoods, and Ecuador is the world's principal producer of balsawood.

With the completion in 1972 of the trans-Andean pipeline (capacity 400,000 b/d), linking the oilfields of Oriente Province with the tanker-loading port of Esmeraldas, Ecuador became a petroleum-exporting nation. CEPE, the state oil concern, bought a 25% share in Texaco-Gulf's operations in Ecuador in 1974, and bought Gulf's 37.5% holding in 1977. Petroleum and derivatives accounted for 68% of export revenue and 35% of fiscal income in 1981. Production of 215,000 b/d in 1981 was reduced to 200,000 b/d in early 1982, then increased in October, when new fields in North Oriente came 'on stream'. Production in 1983 averaged 237,132 b/d. By October 1984 production had increased to 262,000 b/d. Domestic consumption increased by 14% annually from 1972 until 1982. In 1983 about 50% of Ecuador's output of crude petroleum supplied the needs of the internal market. In 1982 Ecuador's export earnings from crude petroleum declined by 24%, to $1,388m., when oil was selling below the OPEC price of $34 per barrel. In 1983 the Government introduced new legislation to assist the industry. Foreign oil companies were encouraged to increase investment and exploration, and in June 1983 the Government opened 11 new blocks of territory for exploration. Between 1984 and 1988 Occidental is to invest $50m. in petroleum exploration. Between 1984 and 1989, it is planned, $1,590m. will be invested to increase the industry's refining and petrochemical capacity, and $883m. will be spent on a refinery on the Guayaquil coast, which will eventually produce 75,000 b/d. In December 1983 further discoveries were made in the south-east, which are expected to increase overall production by 15,000 b/d. Export volumes for 1983 showed a substantial increase over 1982 figures, with petroleum and derivatives accounting for 74% of export earnings. In 1984 three more fields were expected to come 'on stream', benefiting from an 80-km extension of the trans-Ecuadorean pipeline. In January 1985 economic difficulties obliged the Government to suspend temporarily its adherence to the output quota, established by OPEC, which had been reduced by 17,000 b/d in 1984. Ecuador's total recoverable reserves were estimated at 1,300m. barrels. In addition, probable reserves are thought to be 566m. barrels.

In 1981 70% of energy generation was by thermoelectric plants. Between 1973 and 1983 the capacity of Ecuador's electric generating plants increased from 481,543 kW to 1,380,000 kW. An estimated 52% of the population have access to electricity. The Government hopes to expand the hydroelectric sector into the principal source of energy. Between 1979 and 1984 Ecuador's hydroelectric output increased from 816,000 kW to an estimated 1,686,000 kW. A series of projects includes the Paute scheme, with a planned capacity of 500,000 kW, which is scheduled for completion in 1986. In 1982 electricity provided about one-quarter of total energy generation. In February 1983 the Daniel Palacios Dam was inaugurated as part of the Paute scheme. Production of natural gas declined from a peak of 40m. cu m in 1978 to 31m. cu m in 1980, when total reserves were estimated at 58,000m. cu m. Production rose to 33m. cu m in 1981. The Amistad field contained 209m. cu m of proven reserves and up to 537m. cu m of possible reserves. There are plans to build pipelines from Esmeraldas and Shushufindi to Quito. A plant for the production of liquefied petroleum gas at Shushufindi was opened in 1982. Ecuador's other mineral resources include gold, silver, copper, sulphur, titanium, antimony, lead and zinc, all mined in small quantities.

Manufacturing, mainly consisting of textiles, food processing, cement and pharmaceuticals, developed rapidly in the 1970s despite shortages of electric energy. Industrial production rose by 6.6% in 1981, but declined by 5.6% in 1983, as a result of falling production throughout the sector. The value of industrial exports fell from US $615m. in 1980 to $211m. in 1983, and was expected to decline further. There is little heavy industry but some sectors, such as petrochemicals, steel and the assembly of motor vehicles, are being developed through the Andean Group. An $800m. petrochemical complex was completed in 1983, and a $180m. integrated steel mill was expected to be functioning by 1985.

With a growth rate of 13.6% in 1974, Ecuador had one of Latin America's fastest growing economies, owing to the development of the petroleum sector. The growth rate was 4.5% in 1981 but fell to 1.4% in 1982. The Ecuadorean economy deteriorated rapidly in 1982, principally as a result of a decline in petroleum prices and a contraction in the markets for its traditional agricultural exports. After public and private overspending during the oil boom of the 1970s, the foreign debt had grown to $6,700m. by 1984. Inflation increased from 25% in 1982 to 52% in 1983. Reserves of foreign exchange declined from $961m. at the end of 1980 to $570m. one year later, and to $205m. in March 1983. From August 1982 the flow of foreign funds into Ecuador stopped, with severe consequences for the public sector, which accounted for 74% of public borrowing. In the absence of controls on borrowing by the private sector, more than 1,000 national companies were reported to be on the brink of bankruptcy at the beginning of 1983. In March the Government agreed to assume responsibility for the repayment, over six years, of a large proportion of the private-sector debt on the understanding that the private sector would repay the Government in local currency.

In March 1983, to avert a national crisis, the Government introduced a stabilization programme consisting of a series of austerity measures. The sucre was devalued by 21%, from 33.15 to 42.00 per US dollar. The commercial interest rate was increased from 14% to 16%, new exchange regulations were introduced and export subsidies were eliminated. Further subsidies were removed from flour, petrol, diesel oil and other fuels. The price of milk increased by 40%. In addition, cuts were made in public spending. As a result of the Government's new measures, the current deficit on the balance of payments fell from $1,200m. in 1982 to $58m. in 1983. The economic programme proved highly unpopular within the country, but it did enable Ecuador to reach agreement with the IMF over further financial assistance. In July Ecuador obtained $170m. in special drawing rights from the IMF, and reached agreement with a consortium of international banks on the rescheduling of $269m. of debt. In October Ecuador and accepted terms for the rescheduling of $1,200m. in public-sector debt over a period of seven years. In November 1984 the Government and the IMF reached agreement in general terms on further financing. Following this accord, the Government and commercial bank creditors concluded in December the renegotiation of Ecuador's foreign debt until 1989 (amounting to $4,600m.). Under the terms of the agreement, Ecuador secured additional financing of $2,000m. The foreign debt is expected to increase to $14,000m. by 1988.

After taking office in August 1984, President Febres Cordero confirmed that his Government's economic priorities would be to encourage more foreign investment in Ecuador and to liberalize the economy. In September the policy of mini-devaluations was ended, and official exchange rates for the sucre were established for sales and purchases. In late 1984 the economy showed some indication of improving; GDP growth for 1984 was estimated at 3% (after a decline of 3.3% in 1983) and preliminary figures revealed a trade surplus of $1,000m. in 1984.

Ecuador is a member of the Andean Group (see p. 95) and of OPEC (see p. 197).

Transport and Communications

Communications are rendered difficult by mountains and forests. There were 965 km (600 miles) of railway track and 35,662 km (22,159 miles) of roads in 1983. The Pan-American Highway runs for 1,392 km (865 miles) through the country, with branch roads to the coast. The 1980–84 National Plan proposed the construction of a new electrified railway network, as part of a future Andean rail system, to replace the inadequate and dilapidated existing diesel-operated network. Near the coast the lower reaches of the rivers Guayas, Mira and Esmeraldas are navigable for about 190 km (120 miles). There are a number of seaports, of which Guayaquil and Manta are the most important. Three main Ecuadorean companies and some foreign lines operate internal and international air services.

Social Welfare

Social insurance is compulsory for all employees. Benefits are available for sickness, industrial accidents, disability, maternity, old age, widowhood and orphanhood. In 1980 about 125,000 peasants were integrated into social security schemes; the 1980–84 Development Plan aimed to increase the number to 335,000. Hospitals and welfare institutions are run by Central Public Assistance Boards. In 1973 Ecuador had 221 hospital establishments, with a total of 13,594 beds, and in 1977 there were 4,660 physicians working in the country.

Education

Education is compulsory, and all public schools are free. Private schools continue to play a vital role in the educational system. Primary education covers children between six and 12 years of age, while secondary education, in general and specialized technical or humanities schools, covers those aged 12 to 18. In 1975 the enrolment ratios for the respective age-groups were 80% in primary schools and 28% in secondary schools. University courses extend for up to six years, and include programmes for teacher training. A number of adult schools and literacy centres have been built, aimed at reducing the illiteracy rate, which averaged 26.1% in 1974 and 16.1% in 1982. There are 16 universities. In many rural areas, Quechua and other indigenous Indian languages are used in education.

Tourism

The main tourist attractions are the magnificent mountain and forest scenery of the highlands, the tropical jungles of the Upper Amazon, the Galapagos Islands (although tourist numbers are limited by ecological considerations) and the relics of Indian and colonial Spanish cultures. Plans have been announced to construct an important tourist attraction on the Equator, to be known as 'Mitad del Mundo'. The Government has spent US $1.3m. on developing a village and facilities for tourists. There are a number of coastal resorts from which deep-sea fishing is possible. In 1982 Ecuador received 217,008 foreign visitors.

1985: 1 May (Labour Day), 24 May (Battle of Pichincha), 24 July (Birth of Simón Bolívar), 10 August (Independence of Quito), 9 October (Independence of Guayaquil), 12 October (Discovery of America), 1 November (All Saints' Day), 2 November (All Souls' Day), 3 November (Independence of Cuenca), 6 December (Foundation of Quito), 25 December (Christmas Day).

Directory

The Constitution

The 1945 constitution was suspended in June 1970. In January 1978 a referendum was held to choose between two draft constitutions prepared by various special constitutional committees. In a 90% poll, 43% voted for a proposed new constitution and 32.1% voted for a revised version of the 1945 constitution. The new constitution was promulgated following the inauguration of a new President and legislature in August 1979.

CHAMBER OF REPRESENTATIVES

The Constitution of 1979 states that legislative power is exercised by the Chamber of Representatives which sits for a period of sixty days from 10 August. The Chamber is required to set up four full-time Legislative Commissions to consider draft laws when the House is in recess. Special sessions of the Chamber of Representatives may be called.

Representatives are elected for four years from lists of candidates drawn up by legally recognized parties. Twelve are elected nationally; two from each province with over 100,000 inhabitants, one from each province with fewer than 100,000; and one for every 300,000 citizens or fractions of over 200,000. Representatives are eligible for re-election.

In addition to its law-making duties, the Chamber ratifies treaties, elects members of the Supreme and Superior Courts, and (from panels presented by the President) the Comptroller-General, the Attorney-General and the Superintendent of Banks. It is also able to overrule the President's amendment of a bill which it has submitted to him for his approval. It may reconsider a rejected bill after a year or request a referendum, and may revoke the President's declaration of a state of emergency. The budget is considered in the first instance by the appropriate Legislative Commission and disagreements are resolved in the Chamber.

PRESIDENT

The presidential term is four years, and there is no re-election. The President appoints his own cabinet, the governors of provinces, diplomatic representatives and certain administrative employees, and is responsible for the direction of international relations. In the event of foreign invasion or internal disturbance, he may declare a state of emergency and must notify the Chamber, or the Tribunal for Constitutional Guarantees if the Chamber is not in session.

As in other post-war Latin-American Constitutions, particular emphasis is laid on the functions and duties of the State, which is given wide responsibilities with regard to the protection of labour; assisting in the expansion of production; protecting the Indian and peasant communities; and organizing the distribution and development of uncultivated lands, by expropriation where necessary.

Voting is compulsory for every Ecuadorean citizen who is literate and over 18 years of age. An optional vote has been extended to illiterates (under 15% of the population by 1981). The Constitution guarantees liberty of conscience in all its manifestations, and states that the law shall not make any discrimination for religious reasons.

Judicial System

Note: In August 1984 an amendment to the Constitution was passed to reduce the term of Supreme Court justices from six to four years. Following the appointment of the 16 Supreme Court justices by Congress, a dispute broke out between Congress and the Government, which opposed the appointments on the grounds that they were 'unconstitutional'. In an attempt to settle the dispute, it was announced in October that a bipartite commission was to be established to restructure the Supreme Court to include the nominations of both the Government and Congress.

EGYPT

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Arab Republic of Egypt occupies the north-eastern corner of Africa, with an extension across the Gulf of Suez into the Sinai Peninsula, sometimes regarded as lying within Asia. Egypt is bounded to the north by the Mediterranean Sea, to the north-east by Israel, to the east by the Red Sea, to the south by Sudan, and to the west by Libya. The climate is arid, with a maximum annual rainfall of only 200 mm (8 in) around Alexandria. More than 90% of the country is desert, and some 99% of the population live in the valley and delta of the River Nile. Summer temperatures reach a maximum of 43°C (110°F) and winters are mild, with an average day temperature of about 18°C (65°F). Arabic is the official language. Many educated Egyptians also speak English or French. More than 80% of the population are Muslims, mainly of the Sunni sect. The remainder are mostly Christians, principally Copts, who number some 6m. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) has three equal horizontal stripes, of red, white, and black; the white stripe has, in the centre, the national emblem (a shield superimposed on a hawk, with a scroll beneath) in gold. The capital is Cairo.

Recent History

Egypt, a province of Turkey's Ottoman Empire from the 16th century, was occupied by British forces in 1882. The administration was controlled by British officials, although Egypt remained nominally an Ottoman province until 1914, when a British protectorate was declared. The United Kingdom granted nominal independence to Egypt on 28 February 1922. Fuad I, the reigning Sultan since 1917, became King of Egypt. He was succeeded in 1936 by his son, King Faruq (Farouk). The Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936 recognized full Egyptian sovereignty and provided for the gradual withdrawal of British troops, while giving the United Kingdom the right to maintain a garrison on the Suez Canal, which links the Mediterranean and Red Seas, and to use Alexandria and Port Said as naval bases. The treaty also restored the Anglo-Egyptian condominium over the Sudan (which remained in force until Sudanese independence on 1 January 1956). The Italian invasion of Egypt in 1940 and the subsequent Libyan campaign postponed the departure of British forces. After the Second World War, British forces withdrew from Egypt, except for a military presence in the Suez Canal Zone. When the British mandate in Palestine was ended in 1948, Arab armies intervened to oppose the newly-proclaimed State of Israel. A cease-fire was agreed in 1949, leaving Egyptian forces occupying the Gaza Strip.

On 23 July 1952 King Farouk's unpopular regime, widely recognized as corrupt, was overthrown by a bloodless military coup. Power was seized by a group of young army officers, the 'Free Officers', led by Lt-Col Gamal Abdel Nasir (Nasser). Three days later, Farouk abdicated in favour of his infant son, Ahmed Fuad II, and went into exile. After the coup, Gen. Mohammed Nagib (Neguib) was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Chairman of the Revolution Command Council (RCC), a nine-member military junta. In September 1952 Gen. Neguib was appointed Prime Minister and Military Governor of Egypt, with Col Nasser as Deputy Prime Minister. In December 1952 the 1923 Constitution was abolished, and in January 1953 all political parties were dissolved. On 18 June 1953 the monarchy was abolished and Egypt was proclaimed a republic, with Gen. Neguib as President and Prime Minister. In April 1954 President Neguib was succeeded as Prime Minister by Col Nasser. In October Egypt and the United Kingdom signed an agreement concerning the Suez Canal, providing for the withdrawal of all British forces by June 1956. In November 1954, following a dispute within the military regime, President Neguib was relieved of all his remaining posts, and Col Nasser became acting Head of State.

The establishment of military rule was accompanied by wide-ranging reforms, including the redistribution of land, the promotion of industrial development and the expansion of social welfare services. In foreign affairs, the new regime was strongly committed to Arab unity, and Egypt played a prominent part in the Non-Aligned Movement. In 1955, having failed to secure Western armaments on satisfactory terms, Egypt accepted military assistance from the USSR.

In January 1956 Col Nasser proclaimed a new Egyptian Constitution, providing for a strong presidency. On 23 June the Constitution was approved by a national referendum, and Nasser was elected President (unopposed). The RCC was dissolved on the next day. In July 1956, following the departure of British forces, the US and British Governments withdrew their offers of financial assistance for Egypt's most ambitious development project, the construction of the Aswan High Dam on the River Nile. In response, President Nasser announced the nationalization of the Suez Canal Company, so that revenue from Canal tolls could be used to finance the High Dam's construction. The take-over of the Canal was a cause of great concern to Israel, Britain and France, and Israel invaded the Sinai Peninsula on 29 October. Britain and France began military operations against Egypt two days later. Strong pressure from the UN and the US Government resulted in a cease-fire on 6 November, and supervision by the UN of the invaders' withdrawal.

Egypt and Syria, although geographically separate, merged in February 1958 to form a single country, the United Arab Republic (UAR), with Nasser as President. The new nation strengthened earlier ties with the USSR and other countries of the East European bloc. In September 1961 Syria seceded from the UAR, and resumed its separate independence, after the army had seized power there. However, Egypt retained the title of UAR until September 1971. Further attempts at federating Egypt, Syria and Iraq during the early 1960s proved unsuccessful. Earlier, in 1958, the UAR and Yemen formed a federation called the United Arab States, but this was dissolved at the end of 1961. Following the death in September 1962 of the Imam Ahmad of Yemen, a military coup deposed his successor, and the rebels proclaimed the Yemen Arab Republic (YAR). Civil war broke out between royalist forces, supported by Saudi Arabia, and republicans, aided by Egyptian troops. The republicans eventually gained control, and Egyptian forces withdrew from the YAR in 1967.

President Nasser continued to enjoy immense prestige throughout the Arab world and beyond. Internally, he was regarded as the founder of modern Egypt. In December 1962 Nasser established the Arab Socialist Union (ASU) as the country's only recognized political organization. In May 1967 he secured the withdrawal of the UN Emergency Force from Egyptian territory. Egypt subsequently reoccupied Sharm el-Sheikh, near the southern tip of the Sinai Peninsula, and closed the Straits of Tiran to Israeli shipping. These actions provoked the 'Six-Day War' of June 1967, when Israel quickly defeated neighbouring Arab states, including Egypt. The war left Israel in control of the Gaza Strip and a large area of Egyptian territory, including the whole of Sinai. The Suez Canal was blocked, and remained closed until June 1975. Following the Arab defeat, President Nasser announced his resignation but, in response to massive public demonstrations, he agreed to remain in office.

In December 1969 the office of Vice-President was re-established when Col Anwar Sadat, who had held the post in 1964–66, was reappointed. President Nasser died suddenly in September 1970, and was succeeded by Col Sadat. In October the accession of President Sadat was confirmed by referendum. In September 1971 the UAR was renamed the Arab Republic of Egypt, and a new Constitution took effect. In the early years of his rule, Sadat followed Nasser's aim of unity with other Arab states. However, plans for union with Libya came to nothing in 1973. The Federation of Arab Republics (Egypt, Libya and Syria) came into being in 1972, but proved ineffective. Relations with Libya later deteriorated to such an extent that open warfare occurred on the border in July 1977.

Egypt's relations with the USSR also deteriorated in the 1970s. In 1972 Egypt expelled the Soviet military advisers and in March 1976 broke off its Treaty of Friendship with the USSR. Relations with the USA, on the other hand, became closer when President Sadat came to rely increasingly on US aid.

An uneasy cease-fire with Israel lasted until October 1973, when Egyptian troops crossed the Suez Canal to recover territory which had been lost in 1967. After 18 days of fighting, a cease-fire was arranged. Dr Henry Kissinger, the US Secretary of State, negotiated disengagement agreements in 1974 and September 1975, by which Israel evacuated territory in Sinai, and Israeli and Egyptian forces were separated by a buffer zone under the control of UN forces.

A dramatic peace-making initiative was made by President Sadat in November 1977, when he visited Israel and addressed the Knesset. Many Arab countries opposed the visit on the grounds that it undermined Arab unity. Syria, Libya, Algeria, Iraq and the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, together with the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), condemned Egypt in December 1977, and Egypt consequently broke off diplomatic relations with them.

As a result of its isolation, Egypt experienced difficulty in attempting to produce anything tangible out of Sadat's peace initiative, but in September 1978, after talks at Camp David in the USA (under the guidance of President Carter), President Sadat and Menachem Begin, Prime Minister of Israel, signed two agreements. The first was a 'framework of peace in the Middle East' and the second was a 'framework for the conclusion of a peace treaty between Egypt and Israel'. The first agreement provided for a five-year transitional period during which the inhabitants of the Israeli-occupied West Bank of the Jordan and the Gaza Strip would obtain full autonomy and self-government, and the second agreement provided for the signing of a peace treaty between Egypt and Israel by 17 December 1978. After some difficulties, the peace treaty was signed in March 1979, and Israel subsequently made phased withdrawals from the Sinai Peninsula, the last of which took place in April 1982. Syria, Algeria, Libya and the PLO had met in Damascus in September 1978 and condemned the Camp David agreements, and in Baghdad in March 1979 the Council of the Arab League expelled Egypt from the League and introduced political and economic sanctions. Oman, Sudan and Somalia were the only Arab countries which did not sever their ties with Egypt. Egypt, however, continued to strengthen relations with Israel, and in February 1980 the two countries exchanged ambassadors for the first time. Since the return of Sinai to Egypt, relations between the two countries have been soured, most significantly by Israel's invasion of Lebanon in June 1982, which caused Egypt to withdraw its ambassador from Tel-Aviv in protest.

In 1974 Sadat began to introduce a more liberal political and economic regime. Foreign investment was encouraged but was slow to arrive. Inflation, overcrowding and administrative shortcomings have been the main internal problems.

Political parties (banned since 1953) were allowed in the 1976 elections for the People's Assembly. They were legalized in June 1977 but overshadowed in July 1978 when Sadat formed a new political party, the National Democratic Party, with himself as leader. The special constitutional status of the ASU was terminated in April 1979. Sadat was engaged in a massive campaign of arrests of Muslim fundamentalists, whose influence had grown after the Iranian revolution in 1979, when he was assassinated on 6 October 1981 by a group of fundamentalists led by Lt Khalid Islambouly, who was later executed. Sadat was succeeded by Lt-Gen. Hosni Mubarak, who had been Vice-President since April 1975. Although many of Sadat's detainees were released, Mubarak has continued to order the arrest of fundamentalists, and more than 2,000 have been detained since October 1981. The state of emergency was extended for another year in October 1982 and October 1983. Sadat's ban on demonstrations was lifted in October 1983 but, at the same time, the Minister of the Interior revealed that 13 terrorist organizations had been discovered in the preceding year. Mubarak twice reshuffled the Cabinet, in January and August 1982, in an effort to secure a better economic performance.

Mubarak won approval for his anti-corruption campaign, which led to the 10-month imprisonment of Sadat's half-brother, Esmat, for fraud in October 1982 and the dismissal of three ministers implicated in the affair.

An electoral law, passed in July 1983, required parties to receive a minimum 8% of the total vote to be represented in the People's Assembly. This prompted opposition parties to boycott local council and Shura Council elections. In January 1984 the legality of the re-formed New Wafd Party, perhaps the only opposition party with any prospect of wide popular support, was upheld by the courts after the Government had refused to recognize it on its re-emergence in August 1983.

The new electoral requirements ensured a wide margin of victory for the ruling National Democratic Party (NDP) at elections to the People's Assembly on 27 May 1984. The NDP received 72.9% of the total vote, winning 389 of the 448 elective seats in the Assembly. Of the four other participating parties, only the New Wafd, with 15.1% of the vote, crossed the 8% threshold, and won the remaining 59 seats. It was suggested that the New Wafd's electoral alliance with the Muslim Brotherhood cost the party the support of many of Egypt's estimated 6m. Copts. Despite Mubarak's promise of the first 'free, honest and sincere' elections for more than 30 years, the opposition parties protested that, in the event, the elections were undemocratic, accusing the Government of fraud and the intimidation of voters. The Prime Minister, Fuad Mohieddin, died on 5 June, and Mubarak reshuffled his Cabinet on 16 July, making Kamal Hassan Ali Prime Minister.

A joint Egypt/Sudan Nile Valley Parliament, a Higher Integration Council and a Joint Fund were established by charter in October 1982. The Parliament's first session was held in May 1983. As yet relatively powerless in itself, the Parliament is designed as the first step towards the ultimate political and economic integration of the two states. The Higher Integration Council meets regularly to co-ordinate joint economic projects and the progress towards federation, while also acting as a forum to determine policy in foreign affairs in general and on Pan-Arab questions in particular.

In foreign affairs, signs that Egypt's period of estrangement from other Arab states is drawing to a close have made increasingly plain a division in the Arab world between a 'moderate' grouping (including Jordan, Iraq and, less vocally, the Gulf states), which views the participation of Egypt as indispensable to any diplomatic initiatives for solving the problems of the region, and a 'radical' grouping led by Syria, which has devoted itself to taking Egypt's place as the leader of the Arab community. Arab investment in Egypt is estimated to have doubled since 1982, and in early 1984 was contributing about 21% of all foreign investment. Libya and Syria are now the only Arab nations to continue the trade boycott of Egypt, and they, together with the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, dissented from the decision taken in January 1984 to readmit Egypt to membership of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC, see p. 195). While Libya and Syria have supported the rebels in the revolt against Yasser Arafat's leadership of the Palestine National Liberation Movement (Fatah), the main guerrilla group within the PLO, Egypt has openly backed Arafat, the PLO chairman. In recognition of this fact, Arafat visited President Mubarak for talks in Cairo in December 1983, marking the end of a six-year period of estrangement between Egypt and the PLO. Then, in September 1984, Jordan decided to resume diplomatic relations with Egypt. These events were doubly significant in that Egypt's progressive rehabilitation had occurred without its being forced to renounce the Camp David agreements or the treaty of 1979 with Israel (much to the annoyance of Syria and Libya) and in that a moderate alignment had emerged in Arab politics, which offered the prospect of new negotiations concerning the Palestine question on the basis of the UN Security Council's resolution 242 of November 1967 and the US Government's 'Reagan plan' of September 1982—although this was denied by Yasser Arafat.

Egypt's new-found confidence in international affairs in 1984 was demonstrated in its proposal of two formulas for peace in the Gulf war, though neither was taken up by Iran and Iraq. The division of loyalties in this war reflects the wider split in the Arab world, with Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and the remaining Gulf states supporting Iraq, while Libya and Syria have backed Iran. Egypt accused Iran and Libya of laying mines in the Red Sea and the Gulf of Suez to disrupt shipping traffic through the Suez Canal, after explosions had damaged 18 merchant vessels in July and August 1984. Egypt received minehunting assistance from the USA, the United Kingdom and France.

In October 1984 Egypt unilaterally withdrew from the confederation agreement for a 'Union of Arab Republics' which it had signed with Libya and Syria in 1971; while alleged Libyan terrorist and espionage activities, and the continued problem of Muslim fundamentalists pursuing Islamic revolution, encouraged the Government to extend the national state of emergency for a further 18 months from October 1984.

The resumption of full diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union was announced in April 1984, and ambassadors were exchanged later in the year. Relations had ceased in 1981, when President Sadat expelled the Soviet Ambassador and 1,000 Soviet experts from Egypt.

Government

Legislative power is held by the unicameral People's Assembly. At the general election of May 1984 the number of members in the Assembly was increased from 392 to 458: 10 nominated by the President and 448 directly elected for five years from 48 constituencies. The Assembly nominates the President, who is elected by popular referendum for six years (renewable). The President has executive powers and appoints one or more Vice-Presidents, a Prime Minister and a Council of Ministers. There is also a 210-member advisory assembly, the Shura Council. The country is divided into 26 governorates.

Defence

In July 1984 Egypt had total armed forces of 460,000 (army 315,000, air defence command 85,000, navy 33,000, air force 27,000), with 335,000 reserves. There is a selective three-year period of National Service. The defence budget for 1983/84 was £E 2,130m.

Economic Affairs

Egypt's economy comprises a prosperous, relatively efficient private sector and a heavily-subsidized, generally inefficient public sector. In 1982, according to estimates by the World Bank, Egypt's gross national product per head (at average 1980–82 prices) was US $690, having increased at an average rate of 3.6% per year, in real terms, since 1960. The average annual growth of overall gross domestic product (GDP), measured in constant prices, was 4.3% in 1960–70, rising to 8.4% in 1970–82.

The move towards a free market economy, which is advocated by many Egyptian experts, seems unlikely as it would mean the removal of food subsidies and the state enterprises on which, however inefficient, many poor Egyptians depend. As yet, therefore, the Nasserite model prevails. Nasser nationalized private industry, closed the economy to Western investment and created a huge public sector. State enterprises provide about 80% of Egypt's industrial output. Under Sadat, the economy was liberalized and from 1974 an 'open door' policy (infitah) was pursued regarding foreign investment. An attempt to cut food subsidies in 1977, however, prompted riots which threatened to topple the Government. An IMF study showed that the proportion of GDP devoted to subsidies rose from 7% in 1978 to 13% in 1981, and has since risen to 25%. Total government spending amounted to 58% of GDP in the fiscal year 1981/82.

Subsidies on petroleum also place a considerable strain on the nation's finances: the estimated $3,600m. spent on them in 1983 kept oil products at about 17% of their price in the rest of the world. As a result of this support, oil consumption in Egypt is increasing faster than production. According to the Egypt Energy Planning Agency, the consumption of petroleum products in 1982/83 (20m. tons, worth $4,000m.) was 15% up on 1981/82. In 1984 it was estimated that domestic petroleum consumption was rising at an annual rate of between 12% and 15%, while production was increasing by about 7% annually. Domestic use accounted for 46.5% (19.5m. tons) of output in 1983/84, compared with 42.5% in 1982/83. If, as expected, the domestic requirement continues to rise at this rate relative to production, Egypt, which has been a petroleum surplus country only since 1976, will become a net importer again by 1995. The Government is taking some small steps to reduce subsidies. The 1983/84 budget cut food subsidies by 16.3% but they were still expected to amount to about $2,036m., compared with the $2,410m. spent on subsidies in 1982/83. The likely failure to meet this target was reflected in a 22% increase in food subsidies in the draft budget for 1984/85. President Mubarak had to withdraw increases in the prices of pasta and cooking fat after rioting in the town of Kafr el-Dawar in September 1984, though increases in flour, sugar and sesame seed prices were retained.

Petroleum production in Egypt is small by Middle East standards, averaging about 829,000 barrels per day (b/d) in 1983/84 (a rise of 14% compared with 1982/83). After domestic consumption, only 200,000 b/d was available for export. Petroleum has been the principal earner of foreign currency, nevertheless, followed by workers' remittances from abroad, Suez Canal tolls and tourism. Revenue from petroleum, however, has been affected by the fall in prices, resulting from the world oil glut, and is estimated at $2,230m. in 1983/84, compared with $2,720m. in 1982/83. Egypt, not being a member of OPEC and having been suspended from membership of OAPEC, is able to maintain a flexible pricing policy. During 1983 the market stabilized to the extent that Egypt, having cut the price of its Suez blend by $2 to $27 per barrel in April, was able to restore the price to $28.50 by a series of four increases up to September. Further alterations led to a price of $28 per barrel for the Suez blend in January 1984. Egypt voluntarily reduced its petroleum production by 30,000 b/d in November 1984, to assist OPEC's programme for preventing a collapse in prices. The return from Suez Canal tolls rose to $970m. in 1983/84.

Income in the form of remittances from an estimated 2m. to 2.5m. Egyptians working abroad increased unexpectedly from $1,450m. in 1981/82 to $2,150m. in 1982/83, though they were subject to deteriorating economic conditions in the oil-producing countries where most emigrants work. Adjustments in the exchange rate and improved banking services for expatriate workers, are thought to have increased remittances to $3,500m. in 1983/84, making them Egypt's largest foreign currency earner. Revenue from tourism, which in recent years has been affected by tension in the Middle East, was $1,000m. in 1981/82 and fell to $600m. in 1982/83. According to the Central Bank, the deficit on the current account fell from $2,116m. in 1981/82 to $1,733m. in 1982/83. The trade deficit increased from $4,532m. in 1981/82 to $4,773m. in 1982/83, and the deficit on the budget rose to $6,000m. in 1983/84.

In 1978 the agricultural sector accounted for approximately 60% of total export earnings, but by 1979 its contribution had fallen to 50%, and it has continued to decrease, as population growth has outstripped production, and agriculture figured less in government development plans. The proportion of the total labour force involved in agriculture declined from 41.5% in 1977 to 36.2% in 1981/82. Egypt, from a position of self-sufficiency in food during the 1970s, now has to import more than one-half of its food, at an estimated cost of $4,000m. in 1983. The high birth rate puts a strain on this sector of the economy, as it does on the others. Since 1960 annual per caput wheat consumption has risen from 80 kg to 180 kg, making Egyptians the world's biggest consumers of wheat. Imports of wheat and wheat flour totalled 6.8m. tons in 1983. The returns from the three most lucrative agricultural exports (cotton, rice and oranges) declined after 1974, owing to inadequate investment.

Egypt stands second only to Israel in the amount of aid which it receives from the USA: including aid in the form of about $250m. worth of almost free goods and food, Egypt received some $1,000m. in both 1983 and 1984, although the value of food aid allocated for 1985 was reduced to $225m. Meanwhile, servicing of foreign debt is the biggest drain on foreign reserves, accounting for slightly more than one-quarter of current earnings. By mid-1984 Egypt's foreign debt had risen to a record $19,000m.

A new Five-Year Plan for 1982–87 was unveiled at the end of 1982 with the aims of increasing total investment (particularly in public-sector industrial and agricultural production) and of limiting the growth of the services sector. Particular emphasis is to be placed on the hydrocarbons sector, with £E 1,300m. being allocated to increase production of petroleum and natural gas from 34.6m. tons in 1981 to 63m. tons in 1987. The Plan sets overall annual real growth rate targets of 6%–8%. Public spending is expected to grow at a rate 50% higher than that of private spending; their respective totals being £E 25,800m. ($31,084m.) and £E 8,400m. ($10,120m.) over the Plan period. The Government has embarked upon a monetary policy to reduce the money supply in an attempt to fight an inflation rate of 20%.

An incentive exchange rate was introduced in December 1984 in an effort to check a slide in the value of the Egyptian pound against the US dollar and to undercut the 'black market' in currency. (Egypt has seven or eight different exchange rates for specific purposes, e.g. for basic commodity transactions, luxury imports and workers' remittances.) Egypt's four public sector banks were authorized to purchase dollars at a rate of £E 1.20 = US $1 to attract remittances from Egyptians working abroad who prefer to deal on the black market. A rate of £E 1.12 to the dollar, introduced earlier in the year, failed to attract remittances. Only about one-half of the estimated $4,000m. which is generated annually in remittances reaches Egyptian banks. Later in December, a 'floating' exchange rate was established to reflect more accurately the value of the Egyptian pound against the dollar.

Transport and Communications

The area of the Nile Delta is well served by railways. Lines also run from Cairo southward along the Nile to Aswan, and westward along the coast to Sollum. Roads link the towns. The chief ports are Alexandria and Port Said. More than 22,000 vessels, with a net displacement of 378m. tons, used the Suez Canal, linking the Mediterranean and Red Seas, in 1983. The River Nile carries much domestic freight, and there are long-distance passenger services. Cairo is an important air centre, and EgyptAir has branches all over the world. An oil pipeline (SUMED), with a capacity of between 8m. and 15m. tons per year, links Suez to the Mediterranean.

Social Welfare

Great progress has been made in social welfare services in recent years. There are comprehensive state schemes for sickness benefits, pensions, health insurance and training. In 1982 Egypt had around 1,480 hospital establishments, with a total of 84,000 beds. The current five-year plan (1982/83–1986/87) aims to increase the number of beds to 88,000. In 1982 there were about 92,000 registered physicians and other medical personnel, although not all of them were resident and working in Egypt.

Education

Primary education, available to all children between six and 12 years of age, is compulsory. In 1980, however, enrolment at primary schools was equivalent to 76% of children aged six to 11 (89% of boys; 63% of girls). Secondary enrolment was equivalent to 52% of those aged 12 to 17 (64% of boys; 39% of girls). About 8m. people were receiving state education in the 1979/80 school year. There are 18 universities. Education is free at all levels. In 1976 adult illiteracy averaged 61.8% (males 46.4%; females 77.6%).

Tourism

Egypt has always been a considerable tourist centre. Historical remains of ancient civilization include the Pyramids and the temples at Abu Simbel. The River Nile is popular for cruises. Over 1.4m. tourists visited Egypt in 1982.

Public Holidays

1985: 18 June (Evacuation Day, proclamation of the republic), 20 June (Id-ul-Fitr, end of Ramadan), 23 July (Revolution Day), 27 August (Id-ul-Adha), 16 September (Islamic New Year), 6 October (Armed Forces Day), 24 October (Popular Resistance Day), 25 November (Mouloud, Birth of Muhammad).

1986: 1 January (New Year), mid-April (Sham el Nessim).

Christian holidays include: Coptic Christmas (7 January), Palm Sunday and Easter Sunday (31 March and 7 April 1985).

The Constitution

A new Constitution for the Arab Republic of Egypt was approved by referendum on 11 September 1971.

THE STATE

Egypt is an Arab Republic with a democratic, socialist system based on the alliance of the working people and derived from the country's historical heritage and the spirit of Islam.

The Egyptian people are part of the Arab nation, who work towards total Arab unity.

Islam is the religion of the State; Arabic is its official language and the Islamic code is a principal source of legislation. The State safeguards the freedom of worship and of performing rites for all religions.

Sovereignty is of the people alone which is the source of all powers.

The protection, consolidation and preservation of the socialist gains is a national duty: the sovereignty of law is the basis of the country's rule, and the independence of immunity of the judiciary are basic guarantees for the protection of rights and liberties.

THE FUNDAMENTAL ELEMENTS OF SOCIETY

Social solidarity is the basis of Egyptian society, and the family is its nucleus.

The State ensures the equality of men and women in both political and social rights in line with the provisions of Muslim legislation.

Work is a right, an honour and a duty which the State guarantees together with the services of social and health insurance, pensions for incapacity and unemployment.

The economic basis of the Republic is a socialist democratic system based on sufficiency and justice in a manner preventing exploitation.

Ownership is of three kinds, public, co-operative and private. The public sector assumes the main responsibility for the regulation and growth of the national economy under the development plan.

Property is subject to the people's control.

Private ownership is safeguarded and may not be sequestrated except in cases specified in law nor expropriated except for the general good against fair legal compensation. The right of inheritance is guaranteed in it.

Nationalization shall only be allowed for considerations of public interest in accordance with the law and against compensation.

Agricultural holding may be limited by law.

The State follows a comprehensive central planning and compulsory planning approach based on quinquennial socio-economic and cultural development plans whereby the society's resources are mobilized and put to the best use.

The public sector assumes the leading role in the development of the national economy. The State provides absolute protection of this sector as well as the property of co-operative societies and trade unions against all attempts to tamper with them.

PUBLIC LIBERTIES, RIGHTS AND DUTIES

All citizens are equal before the law. Personal liberty is a natural right and no one may be arrested, searched, imprisoned or restricted in any way without a court order.

Houses have sanctity, and shall not be placed under surveillance or searched without a court order with reasons given for such action.

The law safeguards the sanctities of the private lives of all citizens; so have all postal, telegraphic, telephonic and other means of communication which may not therefore be confiscated, or perused except by a court order giving the reasons, and only for a specified period.

Public rights and freedoms are also inviolate and all calls for atheism and anything that reflects adversely on divine religions is prohibited.

The freedom of opinion, the Press, printing and publications and all information media are safeguarded.

Press censorship is forbidden, so are warnings, suspensions or cancellations through administrative channels. Under exceptional circumstances as in cases of emergency or in war time, censorship may be imposed on information media for a definite period.

Egyptians have the right to permanent or provisional emigration and no Egyptian may be deported or prevented from returning to the country.

Citizens have the right to private meetings in peace provided they bear no arms. Egyptians also have the right to form societies which have no secret activities. Public meetings are also allowed within the limits of the law.

SOVEREIGNTY OF THE LAW

All acts of crime should be specified together with the penalties for the acts.

Recourse to justice, it says, is a right of all citizens, and those who are financially unable, will be assured of means to defend their rights.

Except in cases of flagrante delicto, no person may be arrested or their freedom restricted unless an order authorizing arrest has been given by the competent judge or the public prosecution in accordance with the provisions of law.

SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT

The President, who must be of Egyptian parentage and at least 40 years old, is nominated by at least one-third of the members of the People's Assembly, approved by at least two-thirds, and elected by popular referendum. His term is for six years and he 'may be re-elected for another subsequent term'. He may take emergency measures in the interests of the State but these measures must be approved by referendum within 60 days.

The People's Assembly, elected for five years, is the legislative body and approves general policy, the budget and the development plan. It shall have 'not less than 350' elected members, at least half of whom shall be workers or farmers, and the President may appoint up to ten additional members. In exceptional circumstances the Assembly, by a two-thirds vote, may authorize the President to rule by decree for a specified period but these decrees must be approved by the Assembly at its next meeting. The law governing the composition of the People's Assembly was amended in May 1979 (see People's Assembly, below).

The Assembly may pass a vote of no confidence in a Deputy Prime Minister, a Minister or a Deputy Minister, provided three days' notice of the vote is given, and the minister must then resign. In the case of the Prime Minister, the Assembly may 'prescribe' his responsibility and submit a report to the President: if the President disagrees with the report but the Assembly persists, then the matter is put to a referendum: if the people support the President the Assembly is dissolved; if they support the Assembly the President must accept the resignation of the Government. The President may dissolve the Assembly prematurely, but his action must be approved by a referendum and elections must be held within 60 days.

Executive Authority is vested in the President, who may appoint one or more vice-presidents and appoints all ministers. He may also dismiss the vice-presidents and ministers. The President has 'the right to refer to the people in connection with important matters related to the country's higher interests.' The Government is described as 'the supreme executive and administrative organ of the state'. Its members, whether full ministers or deputy ministers, must be at least 35 years old. Further sections define the roles of Local Government, Specialized National Councils, the Judiciary, the Higher Constitutional Court, the Socialist Prosecutor General, the Armed Forces and National Defence Council and the Police.

POLITICAL PARTIES

In June 1977 the People's Assembly adopted a new law on political parties, which, subject to certain conditions, permitted the formation of political parties for the first time since 1953. The law was passed in accordance with Article Five of the Constitution which describes the political system as 'a multi-party one' with four main parties: 'the ruling National Democratic Party, the Socialist Workers (the official opposition), the Liberal Socialists and the Unionist Progressive'. (The legality of the re-formed New Wafd Party was established by the courts in January 1984.)

1980 AMENDMENTS

On 30 April 1980, the People's Assembly passed a number of amendments, which were subsequently massively approved at a referendum the following month. A summary of the amendments follows:

(i) the regime in Egypt is socialist-democratic, based on the alliance of working people's forces.

(ii) the political system depends on multiple political parties; the Arab Socialist Union is therefore abolished.

(iii) the President is elected for a six-year term and can be elected for 'other terms'.

(iv) the President shall appoint a Consultative Council to preserve the principles of the revolutions of 23 July 1952, and 15 May 1971.

(v) a Supreme Press Council shall safeguard the freedom of the press, check government censorship and look after the interests of journalists.

(vi) Egypt's adherence to Islamic jurisprudence is affirmed. Christians and Jews are subject to their own jurisdiction in personal status affairs.

(vii) there will be no distinction of race or religion.

Judicial System

The Courts of Law in Egypt are principally divided into two juridical court systems: Courts of General Jurisdiction and Administrative Courts. Since 1979 the Supreme Constitutional Court has been at the top of the Egyptian judicial structure.

THE SUPREME CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

Is the highest court in Egypt. It has jurisdiction over: (i) judicial review of the constitutionality of laws and regulations; (ii) resolution of positive and negative jurisdictional conflicts and determination of the competent court between the different juridical court systems, e.g. Courts of General Jurisdiction and Administrative Courts, as well as other bodies exercising judicial competence; (iii) determination of disputes over the enforcement of two final but contradictory judgments rendered by two courts each belonging to a different juridical court system; (iv) rendering binding interpretation of laws or decree laws in the event of a dispute in the application of said laws or decree laws, always provided that such a dispute is of a gravity requiring conformity of interpretation under the Constitution.

COURTS OF GENERAL JURISDICTION

The Courts of General Jurisdiction in Egypt are basically divided into four categories, as follows: (i) The Court of Cassation (ii) The Courts of Appeal; (iii) The Tribunals of First Instance; (iv) The District Tribunals; each of the above courts is divided into Civil and Criminal Chambers.

(i) Court of Cassation: Is the highest court of general jurisdiction in Egypt. Its sessions are held in Cairo. Final judgments rendered by Courts of Appeal in criminal and civil litigation may be petitioned to the Court of Cassation by the Defendant or the Public Prosecutor in criminal litigation and by any of the parties in interest in civil litigation on grounds of defective application or interpretation of the law as stated in the challenged judgment, on grounds of irregularity of form or procedure, or violation of due process, and on grounds of defective reasoning of judgment rendered. The Court of Cassation is composed of the President, 15 Vice-Presidents and 80 Justices.

President: Hon. Moustafa Selim.

(ii) The Courts of Appeal: Each has geographical jurisdiction over one or more of the governorates of Egypt. Each Court of Appeal is divided into Criminal and Civil Chambers. The Criminal Chambers try felonies, and the Civil Chambers hear appeals filed against such judgment rendered by the Tribunals of First Instance where the law so stipulates. Each Chamber is composed of three superior judges. Each Court of Appeal is composed of President, and sufficient numbers of Vice-Presidents and Superior Judges.

(iii) The Tribunals of First Instance: In each governorate there are one or more Tribunals of First Instance, each of which is divided into several Chambers for criminal and civil litigations. Each Chamber is composed of: (a) a presiding judge, and (b) two sitting judges. A Tribunal of First Instance hears, as an Appellate Court, certain litigations as provided under the law.

(iv) District Tribunals: Each is a one-judge ancillary Chamber of a Tribunal of First Instance, having jurisdiction over minor civil and criminal litigations in smaller districts within the jurisdiction of such Tribunal of First Instance.

PUBLIC PROSECUTION

Public prosecution is headed by the Attorney General, assisted by a number of Senior Deputy and Deputy Attorneys General, and a sufficient number of chief prosecutors, prosecutors and assistant prosecutors. Public prosecution is represented at all levels of the Courts of General Jurisdiction in all criminal litigations and also in certain civil litigations as required by the law. Public prosecution controls and supervises enforcement of criminal law judgments.

Attorney General: Hon. Salah Elrasheidy.

ADMINISTRATIVE COURTS SYSTEM (CONSEIL D'ETAT)

The Administrative Courts have jurisdiction over litigations involving the State or any of its governmental agencies. The Administrative Courts system is divided into two courts: the Administrative Courts and the Judicial Administrative Courts, at the top of which is the High Administrative Court.

President of Conseil d'Etat: Hon. Taher Abdel-Hamid.

State Prosecutor: Raaga al-Arabi.

THE STATE COUNCIL

Is an independent judicial body which has the authority to make decisions in administrative disputes and disciplinary cases within the judicial system.

THE SUPREME JUDICIAL COUNCIL

The Supreme Judicial Council was reinstituted in 1984, having been abolished in 1969. It exists to guarantee the independence of the judicial system from outside interference and is consulted with regard to draft laws organizing the affairs of the judicial bodies.

Religion

About 90% of Egyptians are Muslims, and almost all of these follow Sunni tenets. There are about 6m. Copts, forming the largest religious minority. Besides the Copts there are other Christian minorities numbering about a quarter of a million and consisting of Greek Orthodox, Roman Catholics, Armenians and Protestants. There is also a small Jewish minority.

In September 1981 Pope Shenouda was banished to a monastery by President Sadat and a committee of five bishops was appointed to administer the Church. This decree was rescinded in April 1982 and the church's synod called upon to elect a new pope. However, Pope Shenouda was released from internal exile and resumed his duties in January 1985.

The Press

Despite a fairly high illiteracy rate, the Egyptian Press is well developed. Cairo is the biggest publishing centre in the Middle East.

Legally all newspapers and magazines come under the control of the Supreme Press Council. The four big publishing houses of al-Ahram, Dar al-Hilal, Dar Akhbar al-Yom and Dar al-Gomhouriya, operate as separate entities and compete with each other commercially. Dar al-Hilal is concerned only with magazines and publishes al-Mussawar, Hawa'a and al-Kawakeb. Dar Akhbar al-Yom publishes the daily newspaper al-Akhbar, the weekly newspaper Akhbar al-Yom and the weekly magazine Akher Saa.

Dar al-Gomhouriya publishes the daily al-Gomhouriya, the daily English language paper Egyptian Gazette, the daily French newspaper Le Progrès Egyptien and the afternoon paper al-Misaa.

The most authoritative daily newspaper is the very old established al-Ahram. Other popular large circulation magazines are Rose al-Youssef, Sabah al-Kheir and al Izaw w'al Television.

In May 1975 President Sadat set up the Supreme Press Council, under the Chairmanship of the First Secretary of the Arab Socialist Union, to supervise the Press.

In November 1978, however, President Sadat abolished the Ministry of Culture and Information, but major papers remained under government ownership. A Press Law of July 1980 liberalized the organization of the major papers and, while continuing to provide for 49% ownership by the employees, arranged for the transfer of the remaining 51% from the defunct Arab Socialist Union to the new Shura (Advisory) Council. The editorial board of a national newspaper should consist of at least five members, headed by an editor-in-chief who is selected by the Shura Council. In June 1984 the Shura Council approved a proposal made by the Supreme Press Council that the posts of chairman of the board and editor-in-chief be held separately and not by one individual.

EL SALVADOR

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of El Salvador lies on the Pacific coast of Central America. It is bounded by Guatemala to the west and by Honduras to the north and east. The climate varies from tropical on the coastal plain to temperate in the uplands. The language is Spanish. About 80% of the population are Roman Catholics, and other Christian churches are represented. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) consists of three horizontal stripes, of blue, white and blue, with the national coat of arms in the centre of the white stripe. The capital is San Salvador.

Recent History

El Salvador was ruled by Spain until 1821, and became independent in 1839. Since then the country's history has been one of frequent coups and outbursts of political violence. General Maximiliano Hernández Martínez became President in 1931, and in 1932 put down a peasant uprising with an alleged 30,000 killings. He was overthrown in 1944, and the next elected President, Gen. Salvador Castañeda Castro, was overthrown in 1948. The next President, Lt-Col Oscar Osorio (1950–56), relinquished power to Lt-Col José María Lemus, who was then deposed by a bloodless coup in 1960. He was replaced by a military junta which was itself supplanted by another junta in January 1961. Under this junta, the conservative Partido de Conciliación Nacional (PCN) was established and won all 54 seats in the elections to the Legislative Assembly in December 1961. A member of the junta, Lt-Col Julio Adalberto Rivera, was elected unopposed to the presidency in 1962. He was succeeded by a former Minister of the Interior, Gen. Fidel Sánchez Hernández, the candidate of the ruling PCN, in 1967.

In the 1972 presidential elections Col Arturo Armando Molina Barraza, candidate of the ruling PCN, was elected. His rival, José Napoleón Duarte, the leader of the left-wing coalition party Unión Nacional de Oposición, launched an abortive coup in March, and Col Molina took office in July, despite allegations of massive electoral fraud. These allegations were repeated in the 1977 presidential elections, after which the PCN candidate, Gen. Carlos Humberto Romero Mena, took office.

Reports of abuse of human rights by the Government continued in 1979. The polarization of left and right since 1972 became evident in the increase in guerrilla activity. In October President Romero was overthrown by a junta of civilians and army officers. The junta promised to install a democratic system and to call elections, declared a political amnesty and invited participation from the guerrilla groups, but violence continued between government and guerrilla forces, and elections were postponed. In January 1980 an ultimatum from progressive members of the Government resulted in the formation of a new Government, a coalition of military officers and the Partido Demócrata Cristiano (PDC). In March the country moved closer to full-scale civil war with the assassination of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of San Salvador, Oscar Romero y Galdames, an outspoken supporter of human rights.

In December 1980 José Napoleón Duarte, the 1972 presidential candidate and a member of the junta, was sworn in as President. In January 1981 the guerrillas launched their 'final offensive' and, after initial gains, the opposition front, Frente Democrático Revolucionario—FDR (allied with the guerrilla front, the Farabundo Martí de Liberación Nacional—FMLN), called for negotiations with the USA. The US authorities referred them to the Salvadorean Government, which refused to recognize the FDR while it was linked with the guerrillas. The USA supported the Duarte Government and provided US $133m. and $26m. in civilian and military aid respectively in 1981. In February the US Government published allegations concerning Cuban and Soviet military supplies to the guerrillas. During 1981 the guerrilla forces unified and strengthened their hold on the north and east of the country. They continued their attacks on key economic targets, mainly bridges, electricity pylons and military installations, while the army retaliated by indiscriminately punishing the local population in guerrilla-controlled areas. By December 1981 there were an estimated 300,000 refugees, many of whom were in neighbouring countries. Large areas of Morazán, Chalatenango and Cabañas provinces were almost completely depopulated. Despite participation by Honduran and Guatemalan forces in counter-insurgency operations against the guerrillas, no victory was attained.

Elections to a Constituent Assembly, to take place in March 1982, were approved by an electoral law in December 1981 and backed by the USA, which secured support from the Organization of American States. The elections were boycotted by left-wing groups, and many countries which had been invited to send observers declined to do so. The Mexican and French Governments had recognized the guerrillas as a representative political force in August 1981. The right-wing parties were hoping to oust the PDC and then to defeat the left militarily. The leader of the FDR urged the guerrillas not to disrupt the elections, but violence occurred in the preceding days and at least 40 people were killed on election day. A high turn-out of about 75% of voters was recorded. The PDC failed to win an absolute majority against the five right-wing parties which, with 60% of the vote between them, formed a Government of National Unity. Major Roberto D'Aubuisson Arrieta, leader of the extreme right-wing Alianza Republicana Nacionalista (ARENA), emerged as the most powerful figure and became President of the Constituent Assembly. In April a politically independent banker, Dr Alvaro Magaña Borja, was elected interim President of El Salvador, after pressure from the armed forces. However, the Assembly voted itself wide powers over the President. Military leaders then demanded that five ministerial posts be given to members of the PDC, fearing that, otherwise, US military aid would be withdrawn. Presidential elections were scheduled for 1983, and a new constitution was to be drafted. The new Council of Ministers was named in May 1982.

During 1982 about 1,600 Salvadorean troops were trained in the USA, and in February several of the 51 US advisers were filmed carrying arms in a war zone. Agrarian reform was suspended in May, and negotiation with guerrillas ruled out. It was estimated that 4,000 civilians were killed in the first nine months of 1982, making a total of about 35,000 deaths in three years. The Government failed to curb violations of human rights by the armed forces. The guerrillas embarked on a new offensive in October 1982. In August the 'Pact of Apaneca', a seven-point programme covering economic reforms and other issues, was signed by members of ARENA, the PCN, the Partido Acción Democrática, the Partido Popular Salvadoreño and the PDC in order to end the paralysis of the Government. In November a military coup was forestalled by Gen. José Guillermo García, the Minster of Defence, who removed several right-wingers from key military posts. In October the FDR-FMLN called for an unconditional dialogue with the Government, and in November Maj. D'Aubuisson failed to force through the Assembly a measure which would have blocked any dialogue with the left. President Magaña's position was strengthened in December, when a split within the PCN gave the moderates a majority in the Assembly. A commission of human rights was formed, and an amnesty was to be declared.

The presidential election, originally planned for 1983, was postponed until March 1984 as a result of disagreement in the Constituent Assembly over the new constitution. The agrarian reform programme caused a serious dispute between Maj. D'Aubuisson's ARENA party and the PDC, and led to a campaign by right-wing 'death squads' against trade unionists and peasant leaders. In October the Assembly voted to allow a maximum permissible holding of 262 ha per landowner. This result represented a victory for the ARENA party, which had been isolated in the Assembly following the collapse of its alliance with the PCN in February.

The issue of human rights abuse continued to be a major problem for the Government throughout 1983. Following a period of intense activity by the death squads in September and October, when the weekly total of murders exceeded 200, the US Government called for the removal of several high-level officials, military officers and political figures who were linked with death squads. In January 1984, despite warnings from the US Congress that it would make substantial cuts in aid to El Salvador if the situation was allowed to deteriorate, the US Government announced that, in accordance with the recommendations of the Kissinger Report, military and economic aid amounting to US $550m. would be sought for El Salvador in 1984/85.

During 1983 the armed forces failed to make a significant breakthrough in their campaign against the guerrillas. Despite US military aid of $76.3m., the army was unable to contain the guerrillas, and was exposed as incompetent and lacking in morale and organization. Discontent among army officers was demonstrated by an anti-Government mutiny at Sensuntepeque in January 1983.

The failure of the US-trained 'rapid reaction' battalions and frequent reports of army atrocities (including the murder of the President of the Human Rights Commission, Marianela García Villas, in March 1983) undermined both public confidence in the Government and President Ronald Reagan's efforts to secure further US aid for El Salvador. In June, in response to the guerrillas' successful offensive against the important agricultural region of Usulatán, the army launched 'Operation Well-being', a large-scale pacification programme. The campaign achieved only limited success, and by December 1983 7,282 soldiers had been killed or wounded in the course of the year's hostilities. Following their capture of the strategically important towns of Berlín and San Miguel, the guerrillas struck a crucial blow against the Government with the attack on the garrison at El Paraíso and the destruction of the Cuscatlán bridge in January 1984. In February the FDR-FMLN proposed the formation of a broad-based provisional government, as part of a peace plan without preconditions. The plan was rejected by the Government. The guerrillas refused to participate in the presidential election, due to be held in March 1984, and threatened to prevent voting in various provinces. In an attempt to weaken the guerrillas' position before the election, the armed forces launched an offensive centred on Morazán and San Vicente, which met with considerable success. Prior to the election, bombing raids on suspected guerrilla bases increased, and a series of strikes, organized by trade unions, caused widespread unrest. The election was marked by a low turn-out of voters, resulting partly from chaotic voting conditions and poor organization and partly from disruptions by the guerrillas. As no candidate emerged with a clear majority, a second round of voting was planned for May, when the contest was between José Napoleón Duarte, candidate of the PDC, and Maj. D'Aubuisson, candidate of ARENA. In an attempt to attract more votes, D'Aubuisson adopted a more moderate line towards his opponent, but his campaign was seriously damaged by reports which linked him to the right-wing death squads. At the second round of voting, Duarte secured a clear majority over D'Aubuisson, obtaining 54% of the votes cast.

Following his inauguration in June, President Duarte ordered a purge of the armed forces, which resulted in several high-ranking officers being sent abroad, and the reorganization of the police force, including the disbanding of the notorious Treasury Police. Both the FDR-FMLN and the President expressed their willingness to commence peace negotiations. Following pressure from the Roman Catholic Church and trade unions, the Government opened discussions with guerrilla leaders in Chalatenango in October. A second round of negotiations was held in November but the talks ended amid accusations of intransigence from both sides. In December the guerrillas announced new peace proposals which called for the creation of a national forum and the merger of the guerrilla forces with the national army. The plan was rejected by Duarte on the grounds that it was unconstitutional. It was thought that an obstacle to the peace talks was the Government's need to find a settlement which would be acceptable to both the armed forces and right-wing groups. In spite of a truce over Christmas and the New Year, no significant progress appeared to have been made at the talks, and the possibility of further discussions in 1985 was thought to be remote.

In August 1984 President Duarte appointed a five-member commission to investigate various crimes against human rights, including the murder of Archbishop Romero y Galdames. The Government had been prompted to act following reports of the massacre of more than 150 peasants by the armed forces in Cabañas and Chalatenango. By October it was estimated that 44,456 civilians had been killed in the course of the conflict. In January 1985, 20 politically motivated assassinations were reported, including the murder of the Government's leading investigator into corruption.

In spite of the peace negotiations, confrontations between government forces and the guerrillas increased in late 1984. In October more than 200 soldiers and guerrillas were killed in fighting at the town of Suchitoto. In August 1984 the US Government granted US $70m. in military aid to El Salvador.

Government

Executive power is held by the President, assisted by the Vice-President and the Council of Ministers. The President is elected for a five-year term. Legislative power is vested in the National Constituent Assembly, with 60 members elected by universal adult suffrage for a three-year term. A new Legislative Assembly was to be elected in March 1985.

Defence

Military service is by selective conscription of men between 18 and 30 years of age for one year. In July 1984 the army totalled 39,000 men, the navy 300 and the air force 2,350. Paramilitary forces number 9,500 men, and the territorial civil defence force up to 70,000. Defence expenditure in 1983 was estimated at US $157.5m.

Economic Affairs

The economy is primarily agricultural, with foodstuffs providing 65% of export earnings in 1981. The principal commercial crop is coffee, which accounted for 57.5% of export earnings in 1981. Coffee's contribution to GDP declined from 21.6% in 1977 to 12.0% in 1981. Prices fell by about 30% in 1981, and the crop was damaged by rust. Production declined from 3.4m. bags (each of 60 kg) in 1979 to 2.9m. bags in 1982. About 75% of coffee producers were making losses and were unable to harvest the crop as credit was no longer available. In 1983 production was affected by drought, followed by heavy rainfall. In addition, the guerrilla forces undertook a successful offensive against the agricultural region centred on Usulután, causing a further reduction in final production figures for coffee of up to 25%. The 1984 harvest was estimated to be 1.66m. bags. Losses in production were expected to amount to US $360m., or 10% of GNP. Other major crops are cotton, sugar cane, maize, beans and rice. Maize production has increased from 9m. quintales in 1982/83 to 9.6m. quintales in 1983/84. Cotton production has fallen sharply since 1981, when the area planted was down 50% from 1978. Production fell from 2.6m. quintales (each of 46 kg) in 1980/81 to 2m. quintales in 1981/82. The 1984 harvest was expected to decline by 20%, causing a fall in export earnings from $55m. in 1983 to $48m. in 1984. The continued rural warfare has reduced productivity.

The agrarian reform plan, introduced in March 1980 as part of the junta's political and economic programme, provided for land expropriation in three stages: farms of more than 500 ha; farms of between 150 and 500 ha; all rented cultivated land to be turned over to tenant farmers. Some success was achieved with the first stage: 12% of total arable land was taken over by the government agency, ISTA, and 330 estates were allocated to 30,000 workers in the form of co-operatives. Production fell by 10% in 1980/81 but average yields exceeded those of the private sector. A high proportion of funds was used to compensate landowners, and there were allegations of incompetence and excessive bureaucracy. By December 1982 only 52,000 out of a potential 150,000 tenants had benefited from the redistribution of land and landowners had begun to reclaim their expropriated land by force. It was estimated that more than 9,000 peasants who were eligible for land had been evicted, either by landowners or the army. In March 1983 the Constituent Assembly approved a 10-month extension of the third phase of the reform programme, which enabled peasants to apply for title to 7 ha of land. Of the 48,000 peasants who had applied for land by September 1983, it was believed that only 2,600 had received their allocations. In December the Assembly voted to allow a maximum permissible holding of 245 ha, extended the third phase by a further six months and blocked the possibility of further reform, owing to the scarcity of land available for redistribution. In June 1984 the Assembly revoked Article 207 of the land reform law, which provided for a third phase of the programme.

El Salvador is the most highly industrialized country in the CACM. Manufacturing, concentrated in food processing, textiles, clothing, leatherwork and pharmaceuticals, accounted for 14.5% of GDP in 1981. The sector was severely hit by the armed conflict in 1981, when production of large and small businesses declined by 35% and 60% respectively. The sabotage campaign which was mounted by the left-wing guerrillas in mid-1981 caused damage estimated at US $4.8m., and all industry was operating at 52% capacity. More than 170 business concerns have closed since 1979. The flight of capital has been estimated at $1,800m. since 1979. In 1984 underemployment was estimated to be 40% and unemployment was estimated to be 30%. In 1984 the industrial sector was severely affected by a series of strikes, which preceded the presidential elections.

GDP declined, in real terms, by 23.5% between 1978 and 1982. Export earnings fell by 33% over the same period. The trade deficit was $320m. in 1981. Private investment in fixed capital fell by 64% in 1981 to US $500m. Reserves declined from $387m. in 1979 to $130m. in deficit by December 1982. The Government has become increasingly dependent on foreign aid, which amounted to $464.9m. in 1981. The USA provided $133m. in civilian aid in 1981, the World Bank $77m., the IMF $123m. and the IDB $102m. US economic aid amounted to $324m. in 1982/83, and $332.6m. was to be requested for 1983/84, in accordance with the recommendations of a report by a commission under Dr Henry Kissinger. The budget deficit reached $228m. in 1981. The balance of payments had a current surplus of $30.6m. in 1980, but showed a deficit of $250m. in 1981, easing to $152m. in 1982. The external debt was $1,683m. in December 1982. In 1982 El Salvador received $32.2m. in special drawing rights from the IMF and was able to hold down the cost of debt servicing, owing to assistance from the US Government. In September 1983 El Salvador requested loans amounting to $20m. from commercial banks in the USA and Europe, and received $40m. from the IDB. Public spending was reduced by 19% in 1983. Inflation was 17.6% in 1983. In January 1984 a 14% value-added tax was introduced. In July 1984 the Federal Republic of Germany approved financing of $18m. for El Salvador. In 1985 the Government planned to seek new funds from the IMF. In spite of continuing difficulties, economic growth of 1.4% was expected in 1984.

El Salvador is a member of CACM (see p. 114), SELA (p. 218) and the IDB (p. 156).

Transport and Communications

The transport network is well developed. In 1983 there were 602 km of railways and 16,107 km of roads. The Pan-American Highway bisects the country, while a parallel coastal highway, with interconnecting roads, is under construction. The main ports are Acajutla and Cutuco. Ilopango Airport is a military base, while El Salvador Airport, at Cuscatlán, handles international air traffic.

Social Welfare

In 1952 the Instituto Salvadoreño del Seguro Social (ISSS) was established. This institute provides hospital facilities, medicines and benefits for industrial injury, sickness, accident, disability, maternity, old age and death. Health and welfare insurance is financed by contributions from workers, employers and the State. In 1978 there were a total of 67 hospitals and 1,491 physicians. The Ministry of Health runs 250 medical units, including 14 hospitals. In 1978 its budget was 149m. colones, of which 36m. was allocated for investment programmes.

Education

In 1978 there were about 4,400 public and private schools. There were 974,242 students receiving education in 1982. There is one national university and several private universities. State education is free and officially compulsory. In 1981, however, only 56% of children between seven and 15 years of age were enrolled at primary schools, compared with 72% in 1978. Secondary enrolment, as a proportion of children aged 16 to 18, fell from 25% in 1978 to 20% in 1981. In 1975 the illiteracy rate among people aged 10 and over was 38% (males 34.5%, females 41.1%). The rate was 18% in urban areas but 53% among the rural population. The budgetary allocation for education in 1978 was 290m. colones.

Tourism

El Salvador was one of the centres of the ancient Mayan civilization, and the ruined temples and cities are of great interest. The volcanoes and lakes of the uplands provide magnificent scenery, while there are fine beaches along the Pacific coast. The civil war, in progress since 1979, has devastated the tourist industry.

The Constitution

The Constitution of the Republic of El Salvador came into effect on 20 December 1983.

The Constitution provides for a republican, democratic and representative form of government, composed of three Powers—Legislative, Executive, and Judicial—which are to operate independently. Voting is a right and duty of all citizens over 18 years of age. Presidential and congressional elections may not be held simultaneously.

The Constitution binds the country, as part of the Central American Nation, to favour the total or partial reconstruction of the Republic of Central America. Integration in a unitary, federal or confederal form, provided that democratic and republican principles are respected and that basic rights of individuals are fully guaranteed, is subject to popular approval.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

The Legislative Power is vested in a single Chamber, the Legislative Assembly, whose members are elected every three years and are eligible for re-election. The Assembly's term of office begins on 1 May. The Assembly's duties include the choosing of the President and Vice-President of the Republic from the two citizens who shall have gained the largest number of votes for each of these offices, if no candidate obtains an absolute majority in the election. It also selects the members of the Supreme and subsidiary courts; of the Elections Council; and the Accounts Court of the Republic. It fixes taxes; ratifies treaties concluded by the Executive with other states and international organizations; sanctions the Budget; regulates the monetary system of the country; determines the conditions under which foreign currencies may circulate; and suspends and reimposes constitutional guarantees. The right to initiate legislation may be exercised by the Assembly (as well as by the President through his ministers and by the Supreme Court). The Assembly may override by a two-thirds majority the President's objections to a Bill which it has sent to him for approval.

PRESIDENT

The President is elected for five years, his term beginning and expiring on 1 June. The principle of alternation in the presidential office is established in the Constitution, which states the action to be taken should this principle be violated. The Executive is responsible for the preparation of the Budget and its presentation to the Assembly; the direction of foreign affairs; the organization of the armed and security forces; and the convening of extraordinary sessions of the Assembly. In the event of the President's death, resignation, removal or other cause, the Vice-President takes his place for the rest of the presidential term; and in case of necessity, the Vice-President may be replaced by one of the two Designates elected by the Legislative Assembly.

JUDICIARY

Judicial Power is exercised by the Supreme Court and by other competent tribunals. The Magistrates of the Supreme Court are elected by the Legislature, their number to be determined by law. The Supreme Court alone is competent to decide whether laws, decrees and regulations are constitutional or not.

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Equatorial Guinea consists of the islands of Bioko (formerly Fernando Póo and subsequently renamed Macías Nguema Biyogo under the regime of President Macías), Corisco, Great Elobey and Small Elobey, and Annobón (also known as Pagalu), and the mainland territory of Río Muni (Mbini) on the west coast of Africa. Cameroon lies to the north and Gabon to the east and south of Río Muni, while Bioko lies offshore from Cameroon and Nigeria. The small island of Annobón lies far to the south, beyond the islands of São Tomé and Príncipe. The climate is hot and humid, with average temperatures higher than 26°C (80°F). The official language is Spanish. In Río Muni the Fang language is spoken, as well as those of coastal tribes such as the Combe, Balemke and Bujeba, while in Bioko the principal local language is Bubi, although pidgin English and Ibo are also widely understood. About 80% of the population are Roman Catholics. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) has three equal horizontal stripes, of green, white and red, with a light blue triangle at the hoist. The state flag has, in addition, the national coat of arms (a white shield, containing a tree, with six yellow stars above and a scroll beneath) on the white stripe. The capital is Malabo (formerly Santa Isabel).

Recent History

Portugal ceded the territory to Spain in 1778. The mainland region and the islands were periodically united for administrative purposes. In July 1959 Spanish Guinea, as the combined territory was known, was divided into two provinces: Río Muni, on the African mainland, and Fernando Póo (with other nearby islands). From 1960 the two provinces were represented in the Spanish legislature. In December 1963 they were merged again, to form Equatorial Guinea, with a limited measure of self-government.

After 190 years of Spanish rule, independence was declared on 12 October 1968, following a referendum on the proposed constitution. In presidential elections, held in September 1968, the Prime Minister of the autonomous government, Bonifacio Ondo Edu, was defeated by Francisco Macías Nguema. President Macías formed a coalition government from all the parties represented in the new National Assembly. Relations with Spain became strained early in 1969 after a series of anti-European incidents and an attempted coup in March by the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Atanasio Ndongo Miyone, who was killed.

In February 1970 the President outlawed all existing political parties and formed the Partido Unico Nacional (PUN), which later became the Partido Unico Nacional de los Trabajadores (PUNT). Macías appointed himself Life President in July 1972. A new constitution, giving absolute powers to President Macías and abolishing the provincial autonomy previously enjoyed by Fernando Póo (then renamed Macías Nguema Biyogo), was adopted in July 1973. President Macías controlled both radio and press and all citizens were forbidden to leave the country, although many fled during his rule. In 1978 it was estimated that about 100,000 refugees from Equatorial Guinea were living in other African countries, mostly in neighbouring Cameroon and Gabon, and about 7,000 refugees in Europe. During 1976 and 1977 there were many arrests and executions. Nigerian workers were repatriated in 1976 after reports of maltreatment and forced labour. Foreign affairs were dominated by close relations with the Soviet bloc.

In August 1979 President Macías was overthrown in a coup led by his nephew, Deputy Defence Minister Lt-Col Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo. Macías was later captured, tried on charges of treason, genocide, embezzlement and violation of human rights, and executed by a military firing squad.

The Spanish Government, which admitted prior knowledge of the coup, was the first to recognize the new regime, and has been the major supplier of financial and technical aid. Many exiles have returned to the country since the coup, but a number of opposition parties exist in exile and in April 1983 representatives from five of them met in Zaragoza to co-ordinate their actions and to move towards the formation of a united front against the Government of Equatorial Guinea. Under President Obiang Nguema, political parties have been banned, and the regime is dominated by the armed forces.

In December 1981 a major reshuffle of government and civil service officials, intended to counter inefficiency and corruption, included the appointment of four civilians to the Supreme Military Council. In August 1982 Obiang Nguema was appointed President for a further seven years, immediately prior to the publication of a new constitution, which was approved by 95% of voters in a referendum later in the month. However, the President's rule has not been altogether untroubled. An attempted coup was reported in April 1981, and in May 1983 an abortive coup was staged by a group of army officers. A further alleged plot to overthrow President Obiang Nguema was discovered in November 1983. Relations with Spain have been variable, but improved in August 1983, when President Obiang Nguema visited Madrid, and Spain agreed to the refinancing of the US $45 m. debt that was owed to it by Equatorial Guinea. In the same month Equatorial Guinea held its first legislative elections in more than 19 years, with an estimated 50,000 voters electing 41 representatives to a new House of Representatives. Equatorial Guinea's entry into the Customs and Economic Union of Central Africa in December 1983 marked a significant move away from the country's traditional links with Spain and towards greater integration with neighbouring francophone countries.

Government

After the coup of August 1979 the Supreme Military Council ruled by decree. In August 1982 a new constitution was approved in a referendum, making provision for presidential and legislative elections by universal suffrage, a State Council of 11 members and a House of Representatives of the People (elected for a five-year term in August 1983). The constitution also provides for a transition from rule by the Supreme Military Council to constitutional government at an unspecified date.

Defence

In July 1984 there were 1,400 men in the army, 100 in the navy and 50 in the air force. There was also a paramilitary police force of 2,000. The estimated defence expenditure for 1982 was US $6.0m. Spain has provided military advisers and training since October 1979, and the presidential guard is staffed by Moroccans.

Economic Affairs

The economy is based mainly on agriculture, the principal products being cocoa, coffee, palm oil, bananas and okoumé timber. About 90% of all cocoa production comes from Bioko. Coffee and timber are produced mainly in Río Muni. Between 1970 and 1975, according to World Bank estimates, GNP per head declined by 6% annually. With the departure of the Nigerian workers, the economic situation deteriorated further. The cocoa crop was 38,207 metric tons in 1966/67 but, with the subsequent political upheavals, production fell to a low of 4,500 tons. The 1981 crop was estimated at 8,000 tons, and this remained stable in 1982. Production rose to some 10,000 tons in 1983, and was expected to remain at this level in 1984. A programme of replanting, recruitment and training, and the possible return of Nigerian workers, should lead to gradual recovery. Coffee production declined from 8,450 tons in 1968 to 600 tons in 1981, and to only 120 tons in 1982. Timber production grew rapidly after 1979, reaching 60,000 tons in 1981, but there was a general fall in agricultural output in 1982 and wood production fell to 20,000 tons. A new sawmill, with an annual capacity of 20,000 cu m, was built, with Italian aid, in 1982. Equatorial Guinea's total wood reserves are estimated at 800,000 ha. There are widespread food shortages and industry is minimal. In 1981, according to World Bank estimates, Equatorial Guinea's GNP per head was only US $180 (at average 1979–81 prices), the third lowest level among African countries.

At the time of the overthrow of President Macías, the economy was effectively in ruins. Under President Obiang Nguema, aid has been secured, principally from Spain, France, the EEC, the IMF and the People's Republic of China. An international aid conference, held in Geneva in April 1982, aimed to provide US $140m. for projects in agriculture, transport and communications, water resources, housing and urbanization, and industry, mining and energy; and in July 1983 the World Food Programme approved an aid programme of $3.9m. to feed the country's vulnerable groups.

In a bid to further its economic development, Equatorial Guinea joined the Communauté Economique des Etats de l'Afrique Centrale (CEEAC), which was set up in October 1983. In December 1983 Equatorial Guinea was admitted to the Customs and Economic Union of Central Africa (UDEAC, see p. 154), and in January 1985 the franc CFA was introduced to replace the epkwele, which had been linked to the Spanish peseta. It is hoped that Equatorial Guinea's entry into the Franc Zone will bring the country out of economic isolation by encouraging foreign trade and investment. A UDEAC technical assistance programme was agreed in September 1984, designed to help strengthen Equatorial Guinea's administrative structures.

In June 1982 there were 350 Spanish development workers in Equatorial Guinea, working mainly in education and health. Spanish aid between 1979 and 1982 totalled 13,000m. pesetas, but in December 1983 Spain indicated that aid would be reduced in the fields of education, health and defence, following Equatorial Guinea's decision to join UDEAC and thereby gain admission to the Franc Zone. France is expected to increase its aid considerably, following Equatorial Guinea's entry into UDEAC. Spain is likely to continue to give a limited amount of aid to the country, although in future this will probably be controlled by a Spanish co-ordinator based in Equatorial Guinea, in order to reduce the misuse of funds.

There are prospects for the development of offshore and onshore reserves of petroleum, and exploration was under way in 1984 with the co-operation of French and Spanish companies. Preliminary surveys have indicated that oil reserves are adequate to meet Equatorial Guinea's domestic demand. Natural gas has been discovered offshore, but in 1984 the viability of the deposits was still to be determined. Indications of deposits of gold, manganese and uranium have been detected, but prospecting is difficult because of the equatorial forest and the near-total absence of a road network. A law was announced in 1981 which declared all mineral deposits to be state property. These developments and the country's considerable agricultural resources should provide the base for a return to economic viability, and possibly to future prosperity, and in 1983 financial forecasts were optimistic. Spain is by far the largest trading partner, and in 1983 it was estimated that, apart from wood, 75% of Equatorial Guinea's trade turnover was with Spain.

Transport and Communications

Most of the tarred roads which once made travel relatively easy on Bioko, and provided links between Bata and Río Benito and neighbouring Gabon, fell into disrepair during the rule of President Macías Nguema. A new national airline, Aerolíneas Guinea Ecuatorial, was formed in 1982 and was to fly from Malabo and Río Benito to Cameroon, Gabon and Nigeria. A $27m. project to reconstruct the international airport at Bata was scheduled to begin in May 1984, with completion planned for October 1985. The African Development Bank (ADB) agreed to lend $20m. for the project in 1983, to be supplemented by a $4.7m. loan from the Arab Bank for Economic Development in Africa (BADEA). The main ports are Bata and Malabo.

Social Welfare

Health services are extremely limited and diseases such as malaria, infectious hepatitis, whooping cough and dysentery are endemic. In 1975 Equatorial Guinea had only five physicians, compared with 25 in 1971. There were 65 hospital establishments, with a total of 3,577 beds, in 1977.

Education

The 1982 constitution made education the state's first priority, and free and compulsory basic education was to be provided. Education is officially compulsory for eight years between six and 14 years of age. In 1980/81 basic education in nine grades was provided for 40,110 pupils by 647 teachers in 511 schools. More advanced education for 3,013 pupils took place in 14 centres with 288 teachers.

Tourism

During the rule of President Macías, very few foreigners were allowed into Equatorial Guinea. Tourism remains undeveloped.

The Constitution

A new Constitution was approved by referendum on 15 August 1982. The transition from rule by the Supreme Military Council to constitutional government was to take place at a solemn and public ceremony.

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES

Education is the first priority of the state. Civil liberties and basic human rights are guaranteed. The state has sole control of minerals and coal mines, electricity and water supply, posts and telecommunications, and radio and television.

PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC

The President, who is Head of State, leader of the Government and Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces, has the power to appoint and dismiss ministers and to determine and direct national policy. (President Obiang Nguema was appointed for a term of seven years immediately before the publication of this constitution.)

STATE COUNCIL

The State Council has 11 members (including the Chairman of the House of Representatives, the President of the Supreme Tribunal and the Minister of Defence), and is responsible for defending national sovereignty, unity between the territorial units of Equatorial Guinea, peace and justice, and the proper conduct of democracy. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The House of Representatives is elected for a term of five years, and its members should be between 45 and 60 years of age. ETHIOPIA

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

Socialist Ethiopia extends inland from the Red Sea coast of Africa. It has a long frontier with Somalia near the Horn of Africa. Sudan lies to the west, the Republic of Djibouti to the east and Kenya to the south. The climate is mainly temperate because of the high plateau terrain, with an average annual temperature of 13°C (55°F), abundant rainfall in most years and low humidity. The lower country and valley gorges are very hot and subject to periodic drought. The official language is Amharic but English is widely used, and Arabic is spoken in the province of Eritrea. The Ethiopian Coptic (Orthodox Union) Church, an ancient Christian sect, has a wide following in the north and on the southern plateau. In much of the south and east there are Muslims and followers of animist beliefs. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) has three horizontal stripes, of green, yellow and red. The capital is Addis Ababa.

Recent History

Ethiopia was dominated for more than 50 years by Haile Selassie, who became Regent in 1916, King in 1928 and Emperor in 1930. He ruled the country, except during the Italian occupation of 1936–41, until his deposition by the armed forces in September 1974 in the wake of serious regional famine, inflation and unemployment, and growing demands for democratic reform. The Emperor's rule was highly personal and autocratic, but he consolidated the expansion of Ethiopian territory and the gradual process of national modernization which had been begun by the Emperor Menelik (1865–1913). The former Italian colony of Eritrea was merged with Ethiopia, in a federal arrangement, in September 1952, and annexed to Ethiopia as a province in November 1962. Haile Selassie died, a captive of the present military regime, in August 1975.

The revolution of September 1974 was engineered by an Armed Forces Co-ordinating Committee, known popularly as the Dergue ('Shadow'), which controls ultimate power. The Dergue established a Provisional Military Government (PMG), headed by Lt-Gen. Aman Andom. In November, after a dispute in the military leadership, Gen. Andom was deposed and shot. The PMG was replaced by a Provisional Military Administrative Council (PMAC), led by Brig.-Gen. Teferi Benti; the monarchy was abolished in March 1975.

Ethiopia was declared a socialist state in December 1974, and a national programme, called Ethiopia Tikdem (Ethiopia First), was outlined and carried out in the following year. Insurance companies, banks, financial institutions, large industrial enterprises, rural and urban land and schools were nationalized, while peasant co-operatives and industrial workers' councils were established.

Widespread unrest continued throughout 1975 and 1976 despite moves by the Dergue to ease tension by releasing some detainees and promising a return to civilian rule, at an unspecified date. Strains within the Dergue were reflected by its reorganization in December 1976. However, in February 1977 Lt-Col Mengistu Haile Mariam killed Brig.-Gen. Teferi Benti and his closest associates and replaced him as chairman of the PMAC and Head of State.

The Government continued to meet political and armed opposition from various groups, both Marxist and anti-Marxist. During 1977 and 1978 thousands of opponents of the Government were killed or imprisoned in a programme of 'rehabilitation' or 'liquidation'. Until July 1977 the Dergue was assisted by Mei'son (the Marxist All-Ethiopia Socialist Movement) but later formed its own party, Abyot Seded (Revolutionary Flame), which sought to enlist civilian support. However, all political groupings were theoretically swept away in late 1979 when a Commission for Organizing the Party of the Working People of Ethiopia (COPWE) was established.

The Central Committee of COPWE, which was dominated by military personnel, held its first congress in June 1980. It announced in February 1981 that peasant co-operatives were to be encouraged, and that mass organizations for youth, women, peasants and workers were to be strengthened. The second COPWE congress, held in January 1983, announced that preparations for the formation of a workers' party were well under way. The third congress and the formal establishment of the Workers' Party of Ethiopia (WPE), which replaced COPWE, took place in September 1984, to coincide with the 10th anniversary of the revolution. Lt-Col Mengistu was unanimously elected Secretary-General of the party, which was modelled on the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. The congress also elected an 11-member Politburo and a 136-member Central Committee. It was reported that the PMAC would be dissolved at a future date, and a new constitution adopted, paving the way for a return to civilian rule. During the ensuing celebrations, attended by leaders of several Eastern bloc states, Mengistu reaffirmed Ethiopia's links with the Soviet Union.

Numerous secessionist movements, encouraged by the confusion created by the revolution, seek the destruction of the empire created by Menelik and Haile Selassie. These are strongest in the Ogaden region and Eritrea. Somalia lays claim to the Ogaden, which is inhabited mainly by ethnic Somalis, and regular Somali troops have supported incursions by forces of the Western Somali Liberation Front (WSLF). In 1977 the Somalis made major advances in the Ogaden, but in 1978 were forced to retreat. By the end of 1980 the Ethiopian defence forces were in control of virtually the whole of the Ogaden. Ethiopia denied that its forces were involved in fighting which broke out in mid-1982 in Somali border areas. In 1980 an OAU committee declared the Ogaden to be an integral part of Ethiopia.

Secessionist movements have existed in Eritrea since its annexation in 1962, and also in Tigre, claiming to control large tracts of the provinces. In January 1982 the Government announced 'Operation Red Star', to bring the political, social and economic development of Eritrea into line with the rest of the country. However, the accompanying military campaign to allow the implementation of these projects had failed by May. The strongest movement, the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF), faced a major government offensive outside its stronghold of Nakfa in mid-1983, while a similar campaign was waged against the Tigre People's Liberation Front (TPLF) in western Tigre province. Attempts to unite the Eritrean secessionist groups continued during 1983–84, in order to attract Arab funding. In early 1984 the EPLF launched a major new campaign, and, during heavy fighting, government troops (mainly conscripts) suffered severe losses. The EPLF captured the town of Tessenei, near the Sudanese border, and defeated the army on three fronts in the Eritrean highlands.

Earlier Ethiopian efforts to defeat the secessionists were hampered by its diplomatic isolation from its neighbours, particularly Sudan, which harboured and supplied Eritrean guerrillas. The normalization of Ethiopian relations with Sudan during 1980 led to a closing of the border to the guerrillas. The continued fighting in the north during 1984 compounded problems facing areas of Ethiopia already severely affected by famine. The rains failed for the third consecutive crop season, and in May the Relief and Rehabilitation Commission estimated that 7m. people could face starvation. Following large-scale media attention, Ethiopia at last received emergency food aid from many Western nations, but distribution of the aid posed a major problem, as the ports rapidly became congested. Some famine relief was airlifted to affected areas, while Western food agencies sent food and medical supplies into Eritrea through Sudan. Part of the Government's solution to the famine was the controversial plan to resettle more than 2.5m. people from the northern areas to the more fertile lowlands, but critics saw this as an attempt to remove opposition from the disputed areas. In January 1985 it was disclosed that thousands of Falashas (Ethiopian Jews) had been secretly airlifted to Israel by the Jewish Agency, and it was hoped that those remaining in Ethiopia would also be allowed to emigrate, despite the hostility between the two countries.

After Lt-Col Mengistu's coup in February 1977, the USSR supplanted the USA as the principal supplier of armaments to Ethiopia. In 1978 a treaty of friendship and co-operation between Ethiopia and the USSR was signed. In August 1981, in response to US military interests in Somalia, Oman and Egypt, a treaty of friendship and co-operation was also signed between Ethiopia, Libya and the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, which are all Soviet-influenced states. Ethiopia has also developed closer diplomatic links with its neighbours, Kenya and Djibouti, which have attempted to bring about a reconciliation with Somalia.

Government

Ethiopia has been ruled since November 1974 by a Provisional Military Administrative Council (PMAC), chaired by the Head of State. A General Congress comprising all members of the PMAC, or Dergue (whose original 120 members were reduced to about 80), decides policy; a Central Committee of 32, elected by the Congress, and a Standing Committee (originally 16 members, but reduced in 1979 to eight), elected from the Central Committee of the Congress, execute the decisions of the Congress. The powers of the largely civilian Council of Ministers, appointed by the PMAC, are closely defined. The Chairman of the PMAC presides over each of its three sections, is Chairman of the Council of Ministers, Head of State and Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces. Local government is carried out by kebelles (urban dwellers' associations) and peasant associations. These have elected committees with extensive administrative and judicial powers. There are more than 1,200 kebelles and about 30,000 peasant associations, organized into the All-Ethiopia Peasants' Association in 1978.

In 1979 the regime formed a Commission for Organizing the Party of the Working People of Ethiopia (COPWE), which established and was subsequently replaced by the Marxist-Leninist Workers' Party of Ethiopia (WPE) in September 1984, in preparation for the eventual transfer of power from the PMAC to civilians.

Defence

Military service is compulsory. In July 1984, according to Western estimates, the army (including the People's Militia) numbered 300,000, the air force 3,500 and the navy 2,500. Plans were announced in May 1983 to introduce conscription for men and women between 18 and 30 years of age. Ethiopia receives armaments and technical assistance from Warsaw Pact countries, Cuba, Libya and the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen; there are an estimated 3,000 Cubans serving in the armed forces. Defence expenditure in 1981/82 was estimated at 910m. birr.

Economic Affairs

Ethiopia is, economically, one of the least developed countries in the world. It suffers from unfavourable climatic conditions, an inadequate infrastructure, a shortage of skilled labour and, in recent years, adverse terms of trade. Economic difficulties have been aggravated by years of civil strife between the central government and numerous dissident or secessionist groups. Natural disasters, including droughts, floods and plagues of locusts, have contributed to widespread famine and have increased the already huge refugee problem arising from military hostilities. In 1982, according to World Bank estimates, Ethiopia's GNP per head was only US $140 (at average 1980–82 prices), the second lowest level among African countries and one of the six lowest in the world. It was, however, estimated that GNP per head had increased by 1.4% annually, in real terms, between 1960 and 1982. The average annual growth in overall GDP, in constant prices, was 4.4% in 1961–70, slowing to 2.2% in 1970–82. GDP grew by 5.1% in 1982/83, and by 2.5% in 1983/84.

The economy is mainly agricultural and pastoral, with agriculture producing 48.3% of total GDP in 1983/84. Agricultural products provide about 90% of Ethiopia's export earnings. Revenue from coffee, of which 201,000 metric tons were produced in 1983/84, accounts for about 66% of all export receipts. Other important exports are hides and skins, pulses and oilseeds, and refined petroleum products. The USA is the largest single export market, taking one-quarter of total overseas sales in 1982, while the EEC accounts for around one-third of both imports and exports. The bulk of Ethiopia's imports come from the USSR. Fishing and forestry are still small-scale activities, but international aid is to be sought to develop the fishing industry: the potential fish yield is estimated at 80,000 tons per year, and exploitation of these resources could provide a major long-term solution to the country's food supply problems. In 1975 a radical land reform programme, aimed at stimulating agricultural development by breaking down the feudal system of tenure which existed before the overthrow of the monarchy in 1974, was initiated after all land had been nationalized. By 1981 about 400,000 ha had been distributed to landless peasants, but since 1979 the establishment of producer co-operatives, with the eventual conversion to communal ownership, has been encouraged. Only 14% of Ethiopia's total area is cultivated. Much of the production of cash crops takes place on state farms, which cover a total of about 300,000 ha. Nevertheless, about 45% of agricultural production is at subsistence level. Soil erosion, due to poor agricultural techniques, deforestation and overgrazing, is an increasing problem, and land is becoming barren at an estimated rate of 200,000 ha per year.

Industrial activity, which contributes about 16% of Ethiopia's GDP, is mainly confined to food processing and the manufacture of textiles and goods for local consumption. In 1984 a new textile mill was opened at Combolchia, while a cement works with a potential annual capacity of 300,000 tons began production at Mugher. About one-half of Ethiopia's industry is in Eritrea, although the war there has forced many factories to close. Ethiopia has small reserves of gold, platinum, copper and potash, which are being exploited with the assistance of the USSR. There has also been Soviet exploration for petroleum. In 1980/81 about 40% of export receipts were spent on fuel imports, even though these were received from the USSR at a concessionary rate. The capacity of Ethiopia's only petroleum refinery, at Assab, had reached 800,000 metric tons by 1982. Ethiopia has massive hydroelectric power resources, which provide the bulk of electricity generation. In 1975 the military regime nationalized banks, insurance companies and many large industrial concerns, and in 1976 a private enterprise decree regulated the functioning of the private sector. Shipping and maritime services were nationalized in 1979.

The budget is consistently in deficit, owing mainly to heavy defence spending, which accounted for 27% of total government expenditure in 1982/83. The trade deficit was estimated at 876m. birr in 1982, a 62% increase over three years, but the overall balance of payments was 120m. birr in surplus, an atypical situation caused by an increased level of foreign aid. In 1983 the trade deficit reached 976m. birr, while the balance of payments showed a deficit of around 35m. birr, again alleviated by a high level of external aid.

Ethiopia suffered from its worst drought and famine for 10 years in 1982–84, when it was estimated that up to 7m. people were affected. The northern and western provinces were the most severely hit. The problem has been exacerbated by the fighting in Eritrea, the Ogaden and elsewhere, which has displaced millions of people. Relief attempts have been hindered by the continuing conflicts within Ethiopia, the lack of foreign exchange, owing to defence expenditure requirements, and obstacles created by political differences with the West.

Economic development is hampered by lack of adequate transport and communications, trained manpower and financial investment, and by the dislocations caused by political change. In 1978 the Government began a series of one-year plans under a National Revolutionary Development Campaign, which resulted in considerable economic recovery in 1978–81. The 10-year plan for 1984/85–1993/94, published in September 1984, aims to achieve self-sufficiency in food and to develop the industrial sector. During the plan period, GDP is expected to grow by 6.5% per year in real terms. The state's share of agricultural production is to be significantly expanded, while 216 industrial projects are to be carried out, with the aim of making Ethiopia less dependent on imported capital goods. The country's hydroelectric resources (estimated at potentially 60,000m. kWh per year) are to be developed, while there are major investment plans to improve the airports and the railway.

The plan's success depends largely on foreign assistance, and the Government hopes to attract foreign private investment, following the publication of a joint-venture code in 1983. Ethiopia's external debt totalled around $1,000m. in mid-1984 (about 20% of GDP), but the country has an excellent record of debt repayment. In the 1970s the development aid received by Ethiopia was the lowest per head among the UN-designated least developed countries, but by the end of 1984 large amounts of extra emergency aid had been given, following extensive foreign news coverage of the drought.

Transport and Communications

There is a railway from Addis Ababa to the port of Djibouti, in the neighbouring Republic of Djibouti. In 1983 there were 12,558 km of main roads out of a total system of more than 37,000 km of roads. The highway system is undergoing rapid expansion, financed mainly by foreign loans. A highway links Addis Ababa with Nairobi, in Kenya, and forms part of the Trans-East African Highway. Bus services link provincial centres to the capital. There are three international airports and 40 airfields. The main ports are Assab and Massawa. Communications, particularly between Addis Ababa and the Red Sea, have been severely disrupted by the civil war in Eritrea and in the Ogaden.

Social Welfare

The scope of modern health services has been greatly extended since 1960, but they still reach only a small section of the population. In 1980 Ethiopia had only 433 physicians, 86 hospitals (with a total of 10,203 beds) and about 1,500 clinics and health centres. With foreign assistance, health centres and clinics are steadily expanding into the rural areas. In times of famine, however, Ethiopian health services are totally inadequate. In 1977 free medical care for the needy was introduced.

Education

Education in Ethiopia is free and, after a rapid growth in numbers of schools, it is hoped to introduce compulsory primary education shortly. A major literacy campaign was launched in 1979. By 1983 more than 10m. people had been enrolled for tuition programmes, and the adult illiteracy rate was reportedly reduced from 93% to 46%. Ethiopia was awarded the 1980 UNESCO international literacy prize. Since September 1976 most primary and secondary schools have been controlled by local peasant associations and urban dwellers' associations. As a proportion of children aged seven to 12 years, enrolment at primary schools rose from 16% in 1970 to 46% (60% of boys; 33% of girls) in 1981. Secondary enrolment in 1981 was only 12% of children aged 13 to 18.

Tourism

The principal tourist attractions are hunting, the early Christian monuments and churches, and the ancient capitals of Gondar and Axum. Tourism has been adversely affected by political uncertainty since 1974, and in 1978 only 3,297 tourists visited the country. However, the Tourism and Hotel Commission launched a major campaign to win back tourists in 1980, with 48,830 visitors in 1981 and almost 58,000 in 1982. Tourism brought in an estimated 25m. birr in foreign exchange in 1983, compared with 11m. birr in 1979.

Public Holidays

1985: 1 May (May Day), 20 June (Id ul Fitr, end of Ramadan), 27 August (Id ul Adha/Arafat), 11 September (New Year's Day), 12 September (Popular Revolution Commemoration Day), 27 September* (Feast of the True Cross), 25 November (Mouloud, Birth of the Prophet).

1986: 7 January* (Christmas), 19 January* (Epiphany), 2 March (Battle of Adowa), 6 April (Victory Day).

* Coptic calendar.

Note: Ethiopia uses its own solar calendar; the Ethiopian year 1977 began on 11 September 1984. Coptic Easter is also celebrated (March–April).

Weights and Measures

The metric system is officially in use. There are many local weights and measures.

FIJI

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

Fiji comprises more than 300 islands, of which 100 are inhabited, situated about 1,930 km (1,200 miles) south of the equator in the Pacific Ocean. The climate is tropical, with temperatures ranging from 16° to 32°C (60°–90°F). Rainfall is heavy on the windward side. Fijian and Hindi are the principal languages but English is also widely spoken. In 1966 about 51% of the population were Christians (mainly Methodists), 40% Hindus and 8% Muslims. The national flag (proportions 2 by 1) is light blue, with the United Kingdom flag as a canton in the upper hoist. In the fly is Fiji's national shield: a white field quartered by a red upright cross, the quarters containing sugar canes, a coconut palm, a bunch of bananas and a dove bearing an olive branch; in chief is a red panel with a yellow lion holding a coconut. The capital is Suva.

Recent History

The first documented sighting of the islands by Europeans was made by a Dutch expedition, led by Abel Tasman, in 1643. The first Europeans to settle on the islands were sandalwood traders, missionaries and shipwrecked sailors. Under their influence, local fighting and jealousies reached unprecedented heights, until by the 1850s, one chief, Thakombau, had gained a tenuous influence over the whole of the western islands. Thakombau ran foul of US interests during the 1850s and turned to the British for assistance, unsuccessfully at first, but the United Kingdom agreed to a second offer of cession, and on 10 October 1874 Fiji was proclaimed a British possession.

In 1966 a constitution was introduced which provided for a ministerial form of government, an almost wholly elected Legislative Council and an enlarged franchise. Ratu Sir Kamisese Mara, leader of the multiracial (but predominantly Fijian) Alliance Party, was appointed Chief Minister in 1967 and, on the country's independence (10 October 1970), became Prime Minister. His party won the general election of April 1972 and he has continued to hold the office.

Before independence, Fiji was troubled by racial tensions. The descendants of Indian workers who were brought to Fiji in the late 19th century had grown to outnumber the native inhabitants but were discriminated against in political representation and land ownership rights. A new electoral system was adopted in 1970 to ensure a racial balance in the legislature.

At the general election held in March and April 1977 the National Federation Party (NFP), traditionally supported by the Indian population, won 26 of the 52 seats in the House of Representatives but was unable to form a government and subsequently split into two factions. The Alliance Party governed in a caretaker capacity until another election in September, when it was returned with its largest-ever majority. While these two main parties profess multiracial ideas, the Fijian Nationalist Party campaigned on a 'Fiji for the Fijians' platform in order to foster nationalist feeling.

In 1980 Ratu Sir Kamisese Mara's suggestion that a government of national unity be formed was overshadowed by renewed political disagreement between the Alliance Party and the NFP (whose two factions have drawn closer together again) over land ownership. Fijians own 80% of the land and are strongly defending their traditional rights, while the Indian population is pressing for greater security of land tenure. The July 1982 elections were also dominated by racial issues. The Alliance Party retained power after winning 28 seats, but their majority had been cut from 20 to four. The NFP won 22 seats and the Western United Front, which professes a multiracial outlook, took the remaining two seats. Allegations by the two major political parties that foreign political and business interests had been involved in each other's election campaign prompted the appointment of a Royal Commission of Inquiry which, however, failed to uncover any conclusive proof of the allegations during its investigations in 1983.

All except one of the 24 members of the opposition parties in the House of Representatives supported their leader, Jai Ram Reddy, in his boycott of Parliament, which had begun in December 1983 after Reddy was ordered to leave the House for refusing at one point to stand while addressing the Speaker. The Opposition's demand that the Speaker, Tomasi Vakatora, be removed from his post was unheeded, and the boycott ended in June 1984 after Reddy had resigned his seat in May and had been replaced as parliamentary leader of the NFP, and of the opposition coalition, by Siddiq Koya, whom he had defeated for the leadership in 1977. In a major Cabinet reshuffle in January 1984, Ratu David Toganivalu became Deputy Prime Minister, a post which had been vacant for almost a year.

In March 1983 Fiji's main island, Viti Levu, suffered a severe hurricane, which caused considerable damage to crops and property.

Government

The Head of State is the British sovereign, represented locally by an appointed Governor-General, who is required to act in accordance with the advice of the Cabinet except in certain constitutional functions. The Prime Minister, who heads the Cabinet, is chosen by the House of Representatives. Legislative power is vested in the bicameral Parliament, comprising the House and the nominated Senate.

The House of Representatives has 52 members, elected for five years by voting on national and communal rolls, divided into three categories: Fijian, Indian and General (those ineligible for the first two rolls). Twelve Fijians, 12 Indians and three General members are elected on the communal rolls. Ten Fijians, 10 Indians and five General members are elected on the national rolls.

The Senate is an appointed Upper House with 22 members: eight are appointed by the Great Council of Fijian Chiefs; seven by the Prime Minister; six by the Leader of the Opposition; and one by the Council of Rotuma (Island). Senators serve a six-year term.

Defence

The Royal Fiji Military Forces consist of men in the regular army, the Naval Squadron, the conservation corps and the territorials. The conservation corps was created in 1975 to make use of unemployed labour in construction work. In July 1984 the total armed forces numbered 2,660 men: 2,500 in the army and 160 in the navy. Defence expenditure in 1982 was estimated at US $10.0m.

Economic Affairs

The economy is basically agricultural, and the principal cash crop is sugar cane. The instability of the international sugar market seriously affected the Fijian economy in the mid-1970s but, as a signatory of the Lomé Convention since 1975, Fiji benefits from the Convention's subsidies and trade provisions. The International Sugar Agreement, in force from January 1978, was also expected to boost the industry. A record 487,000 metric tons of raw sugar were produced from the 1982 crop. However, the combined effects of a lengthy drought and a hurricane in March 1983 severely affected the yield in 1983 and, with an output of only 275,877 tons, sugar had to be imported for domestic consumption in order that Fiji might meet its export contracts. Fiji's principal trading partners are Australia, Japan, New Zealand, Singapore, the United Kingdom and the USA. Tourism is a major source of foreign exchange earnings, accounting for receipts of an estimated $F 140m. in 1983. Other important exports are fish, gold and coconut products.

In an effort to diversify the economy and reduce the growing trade deficit ($F 248m. in 1983), domestic industries such as cement, timber, cigarettes and tuna canning are being encouraged by income tax concessions and export incentive reliefs.

The seventh Five-Year Development Plan (1976–80) aimed to expand production and to develop the infrastructure, and gave priority to agriculture. In 1978 an Australian aid project, involving an estimated investment of $A 7.5m. over 10 years, was launched. It aimed to bring 324,000 ha of hilly and largely undeveloped land into production by establishing 103 individual farm holdings, with an emphasis on livestock and grazing. In 1977 agreement was reached on the need for a policy of wage restraint to combat inflation, which fell from 13.7% in 1975 to 5.9% in the year to September 1984, the lowest rate attained for 13 years. However, in November 1984 a proposal by the Government for a pay 'freeze' and price controls, to combat the effects of a fall in export earnings, met resistance and threats of industrial unrest from the country's trade unions. In 1982 GDP grew by only 0.4% in real terms, compared with a growth of 6.3% in 1981.

Under Fiji's eighth Five-Year Development Plan (1981–85), sugar production and tourism are to remain the dominant industries, but the development of cocoa, ginger, citrus fruits, timber, beef, goats' meat, fish and dairy farming should diversify the economy. Reliance on petroleum products is to be reduced by the development of hydroelectricity (the important scheme at Monasavu was opened in October 1983 and was expected to reduce petroleum imports by 60%) and by the processing of sugar cane juice to produce ethyl alcohol (ethanol). In 1984 there were plans to build a large integrated sawmill and chipmill at Lautoka, to process pine wood for export, and 300 ha of land were reserved for a tea-growing project at Wainunu, on Vanua Levu. Construction of a US $65m. tourist resort at Vunaniu Bay, on Viti Levu, was due to begin in October 1984.

Transport and Communications

Fiji lies on the main route between Australia and New Zealand and North America, and is the centre of communications in the south-western Pacific. The international airport is at Nadi, about 210 km from Suva, and there are ports of call at Suva, Lautoka and Levuka. There are no main railways but 652 km of narrow-gauge tracks carry sugar cane to the mills. Fiji has almost 3,300 km of roads, of which 1,200 km are all-weather links.

Social Welfare

The Fiji National Provident Fund, established in 1966, contains provision for retirement pensions, widows' pensions, an insurance scheme and housing loans. Employers and employees contribute equally. In June 1981 there were 125,441 members. Medical and dental treatment is provided for all at a nominal charge. In 1982 Fiji had 27 hospitals (with a total of 1,720 beds), 45 health centres, 87 nursing centres and 325 physicians.

Education

Education in Fiji is not compulsory, but in 1983 nearly 100% of school-age children were enrolled at the country's schools, and the Government's plan to provide free primary education covered the first eight years of schooling. State subsidies are available for secondary and tertiary education in cases of hardship. In 1983 there were 670 state primary schools (with a total enrolment of 120,244 pupils), 142 state secondary schools (with an enrolment of 44,415 pupils), 37 vocational and technical institutions (with 2,344 students), three teacher-training colleges and a school of medicine. There were 876 holders of Fiji government scholarships at the University of the South Pacific in Fiji in 1981. Adult illiteracy in 1976 averaged 21% (males 16%; females 26%).

Tourism

Scenery, climate and fishing attract visitors to Fiji, where tourism is an important industry. In 1983 there were 191,616 visitors to Fiji, compared with 203,636 in the previous year, a decrease which resulted from the devastation caused by a severe hurricane in March 1983; tourism was expected to recover in 1984.

French Overseas Departments

The Overseas Departments (départements d'outre-mer) are integral parts of the French Republic. The administrative structure is similar to that of other French Departments. Overseas Departments, however, have their own Courts of Appeal. Until 1982 each Overseas Department was administered by a Prefect, with elected General Councils, indirectly elected Regional Councils and with elected representatives in the French National Assembly and Senate of the Republic in Paris. Under the decentralization law of March 1982, the Prefect took the title of Commissaire de la République (Government Commissioner) and his executive power was transferred to the General Council. A proposal to replace the General and Regional Councils by a single assembly was rejected by the French Constitutional Council in December 1982. As a compromise between autonomy and complete assimilation into France, the Regional Councils' powers were increased in 1983. In February the first direct elections for the Regional Councils were held. Their wider powers included responsibility for economic, social and cultural affairs.

FRENCH GUIANA

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Capital

French Guiana (Guyane) lies on the north coast of South America, with Suriname to the west and Brazil to the south and east. The climate is humid, with a season of heavy rains from April to July and another short rainy season in December and January. Average temperature at sea-level is 27°C (85°F) with little seasonal variation. French is the official language but a Creole patois is also spoken. The majority of the population belong to the Roman Catholic Church, although other Christian churches are represented. The capital is Cayenne.

Recent History

French occupation commenced in the early 17th century. After brief periods of Dutch, English and Portuguese rule, the territory was finally confirmed as French in 1817. The colony steadily declined, after a short period of prosperity in the 1850s as a result of the discovery of gold in the basin of the Approuague river. French Guiana, including the notorious Devil's Island, increasingly became used as a penal colony, and as a place of exile for convicts and political prisoners, before the practice was stopped in 1937. The colony became a department of France in 1946.

French Guiana's reputation as a political and economic backwater has been dispelled by the growth of pro-independence sentiments, and the use of violence by a small minority, compounded by tensions between the Guyanais and large numbers of immigrant workers. In 1974 demonstrations against unemployment, the worsening economic situation, and French attitudes towards the department, led to the detention of leading trade unionists and pro-independence politicians. In 1975 a large-scale plan for the revitalization of French Guiana was unveiled by Olivier Stirn, Secretary of State for the Overseas Departments. However, much of the promised expansion and development failed to materialize, owing to the lack of interest and of investment, and the problems involved in developing French Guiana's interior. Growing industrial and political unrest in the late 1970s increased calls for greater autonomy for the department by the Parti Socialiste Guyanais (PSG), the strongest political party. In 1980 there were several bomb attacks against 'colonialist' targets by an extremist group known as Fo nou Libéré la Guyane (FNLG). Reforms, introduced by the French Socialist Government in 1982 and 1983, succeeded in decentralizing some power over local affairs to a new Regional Council.

In the February 1983 elections to the Regional Council, the left-wing parties gained a majority of votes, but not of seats, and the balance of power was held by the separatist Union des Travailleurs Guyanais (UTG). In May 1983 French Guiana was the target for bombings by the Alliance Révolutionnaire Caraïbe (ARC), an extremist independence movement based in Guadeloupe, a French Overseas Department in the West Indies. The Socialist Government in France has refused to countenance a change from French Guiana's departmental status.

Government

France is represented in French Guiana by a Government Commissioner. There are two Councils with local powers: the General Council, with 16 members, and the Regional Council, with 31 members. Both are elected by universal adult suffrage for a period of six years. French Guiana elects one representative to the French National Assembly in Paris and one representative to the French Senate.

Defence

France maintains a military force of 7,300 in French Guiana and the Antilles.

Economic Affairs

The economy is based on forestry, agriculture and fisheries. Timber is the main product, with over 80,000 sq km of forests. However, poor roads, lack of development and the difficulties of working in tropical rain forests have prevented these vast reserves from being fully exploited. Bananas, rice and cassava are grown for local consumption, while sugar cane is cultivated for rum production and export, but French Guiana remains dependent on imported food, mostly from France. Fishing, especially for shrimps, has been of growing importance since 1965. Shrimps are processed on land and exported, mainly to the USA.

Mineral resources have been shown to exist, but their exploitation at the present time does not seem to be economically viable, considering the huge investment needed. An estimated 42m. tons of bauxite exists on the Kaw plateau, and 40m. tons of kaolin near Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni. Other minerals are present in smaller quantities, but only gold is mined with any success, with production totalling about 170 kg annually.

Tourism is growing, but improvements are needed in transport and hotel facilities. Unemployment is high, affecting about 30% of the labour force, and is a particularly serious problem among young people. Owing to the comparative failure of central government plans to develop agriculture and industry in the region, new plans by the Socialist Government have concentrated on local initiatives. In 1982 a new investment bank, SOFIDEG, was set up to encourage agricultural development. In 1968 a rocket launching base was established at Kourou, where Ariane, the European Space Agency's communications satellite launcher, was developed. After initial setbacks, successful launches in 1983 and 1984 have confirmed the centre's future commercial prospects.

There has been a steady flow of emigrants away from French Guiana, while the Government has tried to attract up to 30,000 immigrants to boost the labour force. These have included civil servants from France, and members of the Hmong tribe from Laos. There are also large numbers of illegal immigrants from Haiti, other Caribbean islands, and from French Guiana's neighbours. Although French Guiana is underpopulated, most immigrants remain in Cayenne, and impose a strain on the city's resources. In 1983 46% of births were children of immigrant parents.

French Guiana, in common with other French Overseas Departments, is heavily dependent on French bugetary aid, and on imports of food and energy. In 1982 there was a trade deficit of 1,431.3m. francs.

Transport and Communications

There are 321 km of roads along the coastal strip, linking the main towns with the capital, Cayenne. The rivers provide the best means of access to the interior, while coastal ferries operate between the main ports of Dégrad-des-Cannes, Kourou, Cayenne and Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni. The international airport is at Rochambeau, 16 km from Cayenne. Air Guyane operates internal air services.

Social Welfare

In 1980 there were five hospitals, with a total of 868 beds. The Institut Pasteur undertakes research into malaria and other tropical diseases. There is a system of social security similar to the French model. In 1979 there were 65 physicians working in French Guiana.

Education

Education is modelled on the French system, and is compulsory for 10 years between the ages of six and 16 years. State education is free. There are also a number of private denominational schools. The number of pupils has increased dramatically since 1973, placing a strain on the education system. Higher education in law is provided by a branch of the Universitaire Antilles-Guyane in Cayenne.

Tourism

Tourism has expanded recently, but there is still much scope for development and improvement of tourist facilities. The main attractions are the natural beauty of the tropical scenery, and the Amerindian villages of the interior.

GUADELOUPE

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Capital

Guadeloupe is the most northerly of the Windward Islands group in the West Indies. Dominica lies to the south, and Antigua and Montserrat to the north-west. Guadeloupe is formed by two large islands, Grande-Terre and Basse-Terre, separated by a narrow sea channel, with a smaller island, Marie-Galante, to the south-east. There are also a number of small dependencies, among the Leeward Islands. The climate is tropical, with an average temperature of 26°C (79°F), and a more humid and wet season between June and November. French is the official language, but a Creole patois is widely spoken. The majority of the population are Christians, and belong to the Roman Catholic Church. The capital is the town of Basse-Terre; the other main town and principal commercial centre is Pointe-à-Pitre on Grande-Terre.

Recent History

Guadeloupe was first occupied by the French in 1635, and has remained French territory, apart from a number of brief occupations by the British in the 18th and early 19th century. It gained departmental status in 1946.

Economic and political power has been the monopoly of the white Creole population who wish to maintain the country's relationship with France. The right-wing and centre parties have traditionally been the strongest political force on the islands, and in February 1983 won a majority of seats on the Regional Council. However, most Guadeloupeans are dissatisfied with the economic results of departmentalization, and the attitudes of central government towards Guadeloupe's own identity. Industrial and political unrest increased during the 1970s, in response to rising unemployment (affecting more than 30% of the labour force) and the deterioration of the economy. The major left-wing party, the Parti Communiste Guadeloupéen (PCG), favours greater internal autonomy, and has rejected independence at any cost. In elections pro-independence parties have rarely gained more than 5% of the vote, but their activities have served to increase tension on the islands. Several have turned to violence as a means of expressing their opposition to what they see as French colonialism. In 1980 and 1981 there was a series of bomb attacks on hotels, government offices and other targets by a group called the Groupe Libération Armée (GLA), and in 1983 and 1984 further bombings by a group called the Alliance Révolutionnaire Caraïbe (ARC). The Government responded by outlawing the ARC and reinforcing the military and police presence on the islands.

Government

France is represented in Guadeloupe by a Government Commissioner. There are two councils with local powers: the 36-member General Council and the 41-member Regional Council. Both are elected by universal adult suffrage for a period of six years. Guadeloupe sends three elected representatives to the French National Assembly in Paris and two to the Senate.

Defence

France maintains a military force of 7,300 in French Guiana and the Antilles.

Economic Affairs

Guadeloupe's economy is based on agriculture, tourism and light industry, but is heavily dependent on French aid and imports.

Agricultural production is dominated by the sugar industry, but this traditional sector of the economy is in decline. In 1983 less than 35% of available agricultural land was planted with sugar cane. The annual harvest of cane declined from 1.8m. metric tons in 1962 to 480,000 tons in 1984, and production of raw sugar consequently dropped from 184,812 tons in 1965 to 41,200 tons in 1984. Only four sugar factories remain in operation, and these suffer from inefficiency, lack of investment and large financial deficits. Government attempts to revitalize the industry by encouraging smallholders have been less successful than it was hoped. However, in 1982 a plan was agreed which provides a fixed price for sugar, subsidies for small farmers, and a 10,000 ha programme of replanting. Bananas are the other major crop, and account for 50% of exports. In 1982 122,390 metric tons were exported. However, a dock strike in 1984 seriously affected the export of bananas. Attempts have been made to diversify agricultural production by developing the cultivation of tropical fruits and vegetables, but Guadeloupe still relies heavily on imported food, which cost 587m. francs in 1983. In spite of a high level of unemployment, affecting 25% of the labour force in 1983, there is an acute shortage of agricultural labour, caused by the reluctance of young people to accept less than the minimum wage (wages are linked to those of metropolitan France). This has led to a large influx of immigrant workers from Haiti and Dominica, and to tensions in some areas of the towns.

Tourism is an important sector of the economy, but it employs only about 9% of the working population. Adverse publicity from the terrorist attacks in 1983 and 1984 led to many cancellations from tourists. The development of industry has been promoted by the Government, and 36 companies were created between 1980 and 1982 at an investment of 120m. francs. However, the industrial sector employs only about 3,000 people, and contributes 10% of GDP. There is an industrial zone and freeport at Jarry. The 65% of the active population engaged in the administrative and service sector produce 80.5% of GDP. Civil servants from France receive a 40% bonus on their basic earnings, and other incentives, for working in the French Antilles. Local investment is concentrated in the import/export business, and in the discount stores which sell imported goods. The islands have a massive trade deficit, totalling 2,680m. francs in 1981. In 1982 Guadeloupe received 2,960m. francs in aid from the French Government, but produced a deficit of 2,700m. francs.

Transport and Communications

Guadeloupe has good communications by road, air and sea. There are 1,975 km of roads, including a perimeter road around Basse-Terre. The international airport at Raizet, 3 km from Pointe-à-Pitre, links the main island to its dependencies, other Caribbean islands, North America and France. The main deep-water port at Pointe-à-Pitre can accommodate ships of over 18,000 tons at its five wharves, while there are smaller ports at Jarry and Basse-Terre. There are regular services to the island dependencies.

Social Welfare

There are two main public hospitals, a pyschiatric hospital and 10 private clinics, with a total of 2,314 beds in 1978. In 1979 there were 373 physicians and 78 dentists working in Guadeloupe.

Education

Education is free and compulsory in state schools between the ages of six and 16 years. The system is similar to that of France, with primary, junior and secondary academic and technical education. Higher education is provided by a branch of the Universitaire Antilles-Guyane, containing faculties of law, economics and science.

Tourism

Guadeloupe is a popular tourist destination, especially for visitors from France and the USA. The main attractions are the beaches, the mountainous scenery and the unspoilt beauty of the island dependencies.

MARTINIQUE

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Capital

Martinique is one of the Windward islands in the West Indies, with Dominica to the north and Saint Lucia to the south. The island is dominated by the volcanic peak of Mont Pelée. The climate is tropical, but tempered by easterly and north-easterly breezes. The more humid and wet season runs from July to November, and the average temperature is 26°C (80°F). French is the official language, but a Creole patois is widely spoken. The majority of the population are Christians, and belong to the Roman Catholic Church. The capital is Fort-de-France.

Recent History

Martinique has been a French possession since 1635. The prosperity of the island was based on the sugar industry, which was dealt a devastating blow by the volcanic eruption of Mont Pelée in 1902. Martinique became a department of France in 1946, when the Governor was replaced by a Prefect, and an elected General Council was created.

The French Government's policy of assimilation since 1946 has created a strongly French society, bound by linguistic, cultural and economic ties to metropolitan France. The island enjoys a better infrastructure and a higher standard of living than its immediate Caribbean neighbours but, in consequence, it has also become heavily dependent on France. In 1960 the French Government granted the island's General Council the power to discuss political, as well as administrative, questions, partly in response to civil disturbances, and partly to the growth of nationalist feeling in the 1950s, as expressed by Aimé Césaire's Parti Progressiste Martiniquais (PPM), and the Parti Communiste Martiniquais (PCM). However, economic power remained concentrated in the hands of the békés (descendants of white colonial settlers), who own most of the agricultural land, and control the lucrative import/export market. This led to little incentive for innovation or self-sufficiency, and resentment at lingering colonial attitudes.

In 1974 Martinique, together with Guadeloupe and French Guiana, was given regional status as part of France's governmental reorganization. An indirectly-elected Regional Council was created, with some control over the local economy. In 1982 and 1983 the Socialist Government of President François Mitterrand, which had pledged itself to decentralizing power in favour of the overseas departments, made further concessions towards autonomy by giving the local councils greater control over taxation, local police and the economy. In the first direct elections to the new Regional Council, held in February 1983, left-wing parties gained a small majority of votes and seats. This success, and the election of Aimé Césaire as the Council's President, strengthened his influence against the pro-independence elements in his own party. Full independence for Martinique is supported by only a small minority of the population, while the majority seek reforms that would bring greater autonomy within French control. The Mouvement Indépendantiste Martiniquais (MIM), the most vocal of the separatist parties, fared badly in the elections, gaining less than 3% of the total vote. Late in 1983, and in 1984, Martinique became a target for the terrorist activities of the outlawed Alliance Révolutionnaire Caraïbe (ARC), which claimed responsibility for a number of bombings on the island. It was hoped that the Lomé III Convention, signed in December 1984, would result in a trade agreement between CARICOM and the French Antilles, forging links between Martinique and its east Caribbean neighbours, and lessen the island's reliance on France.

Government

France is represented in Martinique by a Government Commissioner. There are two councils with local powers: the 36-member General Council and the 41-member Regional Council. Both are elected by universal adult suffrage for a period of six years. Martinique sends three elected representatives to the French National Assembly in Paris and two to the Senate.

Defence

France maintains a military force of 7,300 in French Guiana and the Antilles.

Economic Affairs

Martinique's economic development, in common with that of Guadeloupe, has created a society which combines a relatively high standard of living, and the benefits of a developed island, with a weak economic base in agricultural and industrial production, and a chronic trade deficit. This has encouraged problems such as high unemployment, emigration and social unrest. Sugar cane is the main agricultural crop, but the plantations have been allowed to decline in order to protect growers of sugar beet in France and other EEC countries. Martinique's annual output of raw sugar fell from 12,500 metric tons in 1968 to 2,000 tons in 1982, while only one sugar mill remained in production on the island. Martinique's sugar production now fails to satisfy one-quarter of local demand, and sugar is imported from Guadeloupe. Most is used in the production of rum for export. In the 1970s local investment was diverted from sugar cane towards the development of banana plantations. Bananas are the second major crop, but the plantations suffered damage from Hurricane Allen in 1980. The Government is trying to diversify agricultural products by developing underused areas of the country, and encouraging smallholders. Pineapples, aubergines, avocados and other tropical fruits are produced for the export market. However, the island still remains dependent on imported food supplies. A large proportion of the island's meat requirements has to be imported, and virtually all the vegetables. This contributes to the massive trade deficit, which stood at 4,711m. francs in 1983.

Light industry and small businesses have been encouraged by specialist government agencies in an attempt to fill the gap left by the decline in agriculture. Two industrial zones have been established, tax incentives are in operation, and 154m. francs were invested between 1980 and 1983. However, industry provides only about 10% of GDP. Between 1960 and 1980 the percentage of the working population employed in agricultural and industrial production declined from 62% to 29%. The majority of workers are employed in services and administration, and investment by the white landowners has been redirected into the more profitable food import and tourism sectors. There is also a large community of white civil servants, and other immigrants from France, attracted by the high standard of living and the close links with France.

Tourism is a major activity on the island, but numbers of tourists have fallen since 1981, partly owing to the recession, and partly as a result of the terrorist campaign in which bombs were planted outside hotels. There were only 86,210 tourist arrivals in 1983 (compared with 141,100 in 1981), mainly from France and the USA. In addition, 158,548 cruise ship passengers called at Martinique in 1983.

Unemployment is high, especially in the under-25 age group; in 1982 it affected 23% of the labour force. There is extensive emigration to France and, to a lesser extent, French Guiana, at a rate of about 15,000 annually. The linking of wage levels to those of metropolitan France, despite the island's lower level of productivity, has increased labour costs and restricted development. France supports Martinique's economy by providing large amounts of government aid. In 1982 the island received 5,150m. francs in French aid.

Transport and Communications

Martinique has a good system of roads, totalling 1,606 km and including two autoroutes from Fort-de-France. The international airport is at Lamentin, and serves neighbouring Caribbean islands, France and North America. There are three airstrips for internal use. Fort-de-France is the principal port, both for freight and for cruise ships, with smaller ports at St Pierre, Trinité and La Marin.

Social Welfare

Martinique has a system of social welfare similar to that of metropolitan France. In 1981 there were 14 hospitals, with a total of 4,117 beds, and 361 physicians.

Education

There is free and compulsory education in government schools for children aged six to 16 years. Higher education in law, science and economics is provided by a branch of the Universitaire Antilles-Guyane.

Tourism

Martinique's tourist attractions are its beaches and coastal scenery, its mountainous interior, and the historic towns of Fort-de-France and St Pierre.

RÉUNION

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Capital

Réunion is an island in the Indian Ocean, lying about 800 km (500 miles) east of Madagascar. The climate varies greatly according to altitude: at sea-level it is tropical, with average temperatures between 20°C (68°F) and 28°C (82°F), but in the uplands it is much cooler, with average temperatures between 8°C (46°F) and 19°C (66°F). Rainfall is abundant, averaging 4,714 mm annually in the uplands, and 686 mm at sea-level. The population is of mixed origin, including people of European, African, Indian and Chinese descent. The official language is French. A large majority of the population are Christians belonging to the Roman Catholic Church. The capital is Saint-Denis.

Recent History

Réunion was first occupied by France in 1642, and was ruled as a colony until 1946, when, in common with certain Caribbean territories, it received full departmental status. In 1974 it became an Overseas Department with the status of a region.

In 1978 the OAU called for the independence of the island and condemned its occupation by a 'colonial power'. However, this view seems to have little support among the people of Réunion themselves. Although the left-wing political parties on the island advocate increased autonomy (amounting to virtual self-government), few people are in favour of complete independence.

In 1982 the French Government proposed a decentralization scheme, envisaging the dissolution of the General and Regional Councils in the Overseas Departments and the creation in each territory of a single assembly, to be elected on the basis of proportional representation. However, this plan met with considerable opposition in Réunion and the other Overseas Departments, and the Government was eventually forced to abandon the project. Revised legislation on decentralization in the Overseas Departments was approved by the French National Assembly in December 1982. Elections for the new Regional Council were held in Réunion in February 1983, when left-wing candidates won 50.77% of the votes cast.

Government

France is represented in Réunion by a Government Commissioner. There are two councils with local powers: the 36-member General Council and the 45-member Regional Council. Both are elected for six years by direct universal suffrage. Réunion sends three representatives to the National Assembly in Paris, and two to the Senate.

Defence

Réunion is the headquarters of French military forces in the Indian Ocean. In 1983 there were 2,700 French troops stationed on the island.

Economic Affairs

The economy has traditionally been based on agriculture, which employed 14.7% of the working population in 1982. Sugar cane is the principal crop and has formed the basis of the economy for over a century. Only 25% of the land area can be cultivated because of the volcanic origin of the soil, but over 70% of the arable land is used for sugar cane. Annual production of raw sugar rose from 251,000 metric tons in 1981 to 258,100 tons in 1982, but fell to 223,700 tons in 1983, owing to drought. In 1983 sugar exports accounted for 89% of total exports by value. Other crops include vanilla, tobacco and geraniums, vetiver and ylang-ylang, which are grown for the production of tropical essences. Réunion is far from self-sufficient in food, and substantial imports are necessary. The only industry of importance is the processing of sugar and rum.

France remains the major trading partner, supplying 61.9% of imports and buying 52.5% of exports in 1983. However, Réunion suffers from a substantial trade deficit: in 1982 receipts from exports covered only 10.8% of the import bill. The difference is partly made up by financial support from France, which totalled 500m. francs in 1982, and by receipts from expatriate workers. Tourism is becoming more important, and it is hoped that increased investment in this sector will lead to higher receipts and will help to reduce the trade deficit, as well as providing new jobs. Réunion has a high level of unemployment. The 1982 census recorded 54,278 people, or 31.4% of the labour force, as unemployed. Since 1980 the Government has invested heavily in a series of public works projects in an effort to create jobs and to alleviate the high level of seasonal unemployment following the sugar cane harvest. However, large numbers of workers still emigrate in search of employment, principally to France. The rate of population growth has dropped sharply since 1973, from 3% per year to around 1.5%, but the population density remains extremely high (205.3 per sq km in 1982). The rate of inflation has been decreasing, from 13.9% in 1981 to 9.1% in 1982 and to 8.2% in 1983. Réunion's economic future is largely dependent on France's willingness to continue the subsidies implicit in the island's status as department, despite the low tax yield from its generally unprosperous citizens.

Transport and Communications

In 1982 Réunion had 1,077 km of roads, of which 1,055 km were paved. There are no railways on the island. The principal port is at La Pointe des Gallets, and there is an international airport at Saint-Denis Gillot.

Social Welfare

In 1984 Réunion had 3,849 hospital beds; there were 464 physicians, 197 nurses and 168 dentists.

Education

Education is compulsory for children aged six to 16 years, and consists of five years' primary and five years' secondary schooling. In 1978 there were 471 primary schools and 112 secondary schools on the island. There is a teacher training college and a university college, which was upgraded to full university status in 1982. The illiteracy rate among the population over 15 years of age was 21.3% in 1982.

Tourism

Tourism is being extensively developed. A three-year plan, launched in 1979, invested 13.4m. francs in the sector. Several new hotels have been built, and in 1983 a 'holiday village' was opened in Saint-Gilles. In 1983 about 67,000 tourists stayed in the island's hotels.

Weights and Measures

Currency and Exchange Rates

French currency is used (see French Guiana).

ST PIERRE AND MIQUELON

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Capital

The territory of St Pierre and Miquelon (Iles Saint-Pierre-et-Miquelon) consists of a number of small islands which lie about 25 km (16 miles) from the southern coast of Newfoundland, Canada, in the North Atlantic Ocean. The climate is cold and wet, with temperatures falling to −20°C (−4°F) in winter, and averaging between 10° and 20°C (50°–68°F) in summer. The islands are often shrouded in mist and fog. The language is French, and the majority of the population are Christians belonging to the Roman Catholic Church. The capital is Saint-Pierre, on the island of Saint-Pierre.

Recent History

The islands of Saint Pierre and Miquelon are the remnants of the once extensive French possessions in North America. They were confirmed as French territory in 1816, and gained departmental status in July 1976.

The departmentalization has proved unpopular with many of the islanders, since it incorporates the territory's economy into that of the EEC, and other institutions of metropolitan France, neglecting the islands' isolation and their dependence on Canada for supplies and transport links. In 1978 and 1980 general strikes were called by local trade unionists to protest at the negative effects of departmental status. In March 1982 Socialist and other left-wing candidates, campaigning for a change in the islands' status, were elected unopposed to all 14 seats in the department's General Council. Saint Pierre and Miquelon was excluded from the Mitterrand Government's decentralization reforms. In 1976 Canada imposed an economic interest zone extending to 200 nautical miles (370 km) around its shores. As a result of French fears over the loss of traditional fishing areas, and the threat to the livelihood of the fisherman of Saint Pierre, the Government claimed a similar zone around the islands. The possibility of discovering valuable reserves of petroleum and natural gas in the area has heightened the tension between France and Canada. Plans have been agreed to help to solve both the internal and external problems by giving the islands the status of a collectivité territoriale. This would allow Saint Pierre and Miquelon to receive the investment and development that are suitable for its position, and would allay Canadian fears of EEC exploitation of its offshore waters.

Economic Affairs

The islanders have traditionally earned their living by fishing, and by acting as a supply base for fishing fleets operating in the rich seas off Newfoundland. However, the economy has been experiencing a long decline. The number of French and foreign ships coming to fish, and calling at Saint Pierre, declined from 1,290 in 1976 to 774 in 1983. An agreement with Canada, which expires in 1986, limits the amounts of fish to be caught by French ships in the Gulf of Saint Lawrence to 20,500 metric tons per year. Interpêche, the primary company in the fishing sector on the islands (and a major employer), has been in financial difficulties, and required government subsidy. Unemployment affected 11% of the labour force in 1983.

The proximity of Canada, and the islands' reliance on imported goods, has caused a high rate of inflation, averaging 17.7% in 1983. The failure of government employees' salaries to rise in line with inflation has led to a series of damaging general strikes on the islands, including one in 1983, and a threatened stoppage in 1984. High wage demands and rates of social security contributions are resented by employers. In June 1984 a plan for future development projects was agreed, which included improvements in the fishing industry, infrastructural developments such as the upgrading of the airport, and health projects, at a total cost to the Government of 42.5m. francs.

French Overseas Territories

The Overseas Territories (territoires d'outre-mer) are integral parts of the French Republic, each administered by a High Commissioner, Superior Administrator or Government Commissioner, who is appointed by the French Government. Each Territory also has a Territorial Assembly, elected by universal adult suffrage, and a Council of Government or Council of Ministers. Certain members of the Territorial Assembly sit in the French National Assembly and the Senate of the Republic in Paris. The Territories have varying degrees of internal autonomy.

FRENCH POLYNESIA

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

French Polynesia comprises several scattered groups of islands in the south Pacific Ocean, lying about two-thirds of the way between the Panama Canal and New Zealand. Its nearest neighbours are the Cook Islands, to the east, and the Line Islands (part of Kiribati), to the north-east. French Polynesia consists of the following island groups: the Iles du Vent (including the islands of Tahiti and Moorea) and the Iles Sous le Vent (located about 160 km north-west of Tahiti) which, together, constitute the Society Archipelago; the Tuamotu Archipelago, which comprises 78 islands scattered east of the Society Archipelago in a line stretching north-west to south-east for about 1,500 km; the Gambier Islands, located 1,600 km south-east of Tahiti; the Austral Islands, lying 640 km south of Tahiti; and the Marquesas Archipelago, which lies 1,450 km north-east of Tahiti. There are 120 islands in all. The average monthly temperature throughout the year varies between 20°C (68°F) and 29°C (84°F), and most rainfall occurs between November and April, the average annual precipitation being 1,625 mm. The official language is French, and Polynesian languages are spoken by the indigenous population. The principal religion is Christianity, 55% of the population being Protestant and 24% Roman Catholic. Provision was made in a statute of 6 September 1984 for the adoption of a French Polynesian flag, to fly alongside the French tricolour. The capital is Papeete, on the island of Tahiti.

Recent History

The first Europeans to visit French Polynesia were Spanish and Portuguese explorers in the 16th century. Descriptions of Tahiti and other Society islands by Samuel Wallis, who first visited in 1767, and by Capt. James Cook and his officers, gave rise in Europe to their reputation as the 'islands of love', but contact with Europeans allowed disease to cause a rapid decline in the indigenous population, while others were killed by internal warfare.

Tahiti was made a French protectorate in 1842 and a colony in 1880. The other island groups were annexed during the last 20 years of the 19th century. The islands were governed from France under a decree of 1885 until 1957, when French Polynesia became an Overseas Territory, administered by a Governor in Papeete. A Territorial Assembly and a Council of Government were elected to advise the Governor.

Between May 1975 and May 1982 a majority in the Territorial Assembly sought independence for French Polynesia. Following pressure by Francis Sanford, leader of the largest autonomist party in the Assembly, a new constitution for the Territory was negotiated with the French Government and approved by a newly-elected Assembly in 1977. Under the provisions of the new statute, France retained responsibility for foreign affairs, defence, monetary matters and justice, but the powers of the territorial Council of Government were increased, especially in the field of commerce. The French Governor was replaced by a High Commissioner, who was to preside over the Council of Government and was head of the administration, but had no vote. The Council's elected Vice-President, responsible for domestic affairs, was granted greater powers. An Economic and Social Committee, responsible for all development matters, was also created, and French Polynesia's economic zone has been extended to 200 nautical miles (370 km) from the islands' coastline.

Following elections to the Territorial Assembly in May 1982, the Tahoeraa Huiraatira Party of Gaston Flosse, with 13 of the 30 seats, formed successive ruling coalitions, firstly with the Ai'a Api Party and in September with John Teariki's Pupu Here Ai'a Party. Seeking greater (but not full) independence from France, especially in economic matters, elected representatives of the Assembly held discussions with the French Government in Paris in 1983. In spite of feelings expressed by the Assembly, that the French proposals for increased internal autonomy did not go far enough, a new statute was approved by the French National Assembly in September 1984. This allowed the territorial government greater powers, mainly in the sphere of commerce and development; the Council of Government was replaced by a Council of Ministers, whose President was to be elected from among the members of the Territorial Assembly. Gaston Flosse became the first President of the Council of Ministers.

The testing of nuclear devices by the French Government began in 1966 at Mururoa Atoll, in the Tuamotu Archipelago, and in 1983, in spite of strong protests by many Pacific nations, the Government indicated that tests would continue for a number of years. In October 1983 Australia, New Zealand and Papua New Guinea accepted a French invitation jointly to send scientists to inspect the testing-site, and the team's subsequent report suggested that, while the French test-programme presented no current danger to health or to the environment, the structure of the atoll appeared to have been affected by the underground tests.

Government

The French Government is represented in French Polynesia by its High Commissioner to the territory, and controls various important spheres of government, including defence, foreign diplomacy and justice. A local Territorial Assembly, with 30 members, is elected for a five-year term by universal adult suffrage. The Assembly may elect a President of an executive body, the territorial Council of Ministers, who, in turn, submits a list of between five and 10 members of the Assembly to serve as Ministers, for approval by the Assembly.

In addition, French Polynesia elects two deputies to the French National Assembly in Paris, one delegate to the French Senate and one Economic and Social Councillor: all chosen on the basis of universal adult suffrage.

Defence

France has been testing nuclear weapons at Mururoa Atoll, in the Tuamotu Archipelago, since 1966 and was maintaining a force of 5,000 military personnel in the territory in July 1984.

Economic Affairs

The influx of large numbers of French military personnel, in connection with the testing of nuclear weapons in the territory, and the employment which it has created, has distorted the economy, to the extent that many islanders believe that a French withdrawal from Tahiti would cause severe economic problems. Tourism is an important and developed industry, particularly on Tahiti and, together with government military spending, helps to offset a persistent trade deficit. The deficit was 69,421m. francs CFP in 1983, when imports were 74,241m. francs and exports 4,820m. francs. Coconuts are the principal cash crop, and copra is the major export commodity.

Transport and Communications

French Polynesia has 243.8 km of bitumen-surfaced and 497 km of stone-surfaced roads. The main seaport is Papeete, on Tahiti, and there is an international airport at Faaa, 6 km from Papeete, and about 40 smaller airstrips elsewhere in the territory.

Social Welfare

In 1978 there were 30 hospitals in French Polynesia, with a total of 890 beds, and in 1979 there were 125 physicians working in the territory.

Education

Education is compulsory for eight years between six and 14 years of age. It is free of charge for day pupils in government schools. MAYOTTE

Introduction

The island of Mayotte forms part of the Comoro archipelago, which lies between the island of Madagascar and the east coast of the African mainland. Since the Comoros unilaterally declared independence in July 1975, Mayotte (Mahoré) has been administered separately by France. The independent Comoran state claims Mayotte as part of its territory and officially represents it in international organizations, including the United Nations. France has introduced a special status for the island, under which it is known as a collectivité territoriale, something between an overseas territory and an overseas department. Mayotte has one representative in the National Assembly in Paris, and one in the Senate. Following the coup in the Comoros in May 1978, Mayotte rejected the new government's proposal that it should rejoin the other islands under a federal system, and reaffirmed its intention of remaining linked to France. The main political party on Mayotte, the Mouvement populaire mahorais (MPM), demands full departmental status for the island, but France has been reluctant to grant this in view of Mayotte's undeveloped condition. In December 1979 the French National Assembly approved legislation to prolong Mayotte's special status for another five years, during which the islanders' were to be consulted. However, in October 1984 the National Assembly further prolonged Mayotte's status, and the referendum on the island's future was postponed indefinitely. The UN General Assembly has passed several resolutions reaffirming the sovereignty of the Comoros over the island, and urging France to come to an agreement with the Comoran government as soon as possible. The OAU shares this view. (For further details of the recent history of the island, see the chapter on the Comoros, p. 1513.)

The economy of the island is entirely agricultural. Vanilla, ylang-ylang, coffee and copra are the main products. The principal towns are Dzaoudzi (4,256 inhabitants) and Mamoudzou (7,800). The island is dependent on French aid, which came to about 84m. francs in 1983. There were 300 French troops stationed on Mayotte in 1984.

The Constitution

In a referendum in April 1976, the population of Mayotte voted to renounce the status of an overseas territory. They expressed their desire for departmental status, but this has been rejected by the French government. The status of the island as a collectivité territoriale involved the election of a Council with 17 members to assist the Prefect (now Government Commissioner) in the administration of the island. In December 1979 the French National Assembly voted to extend this status for five years. A further referendum was due to be held in 1984, but was postponed indefinitely in October of that year.

NEW CALEDONIA

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Capital

The territory of New Caledonia comprises one large island and several smaller ones, lying in the south Pacific Ocean, about 1,500 km (930 miles) east of Queensland, Australia. The main island, New Caledonia, is long and narrow, and has a total area of 16,750 sq km; rugged mountains divide the west of the island from the east, and there is little flat land. The nearby Loyalty Islands, which are administratively part of the territory, are 2,353 sq km in area, and a third group of islands, the uninhabited Chesterfield Islands, lies about 400 km north-west of the main island. The climate is generally a mild one, with an average temperature of about 23°C (73°F) and a rainy season between December and March. The average rainfall in the east of the main island is about 2,000 mm (80 in) per year, and in the west about 1,000 mm (40 in). French is the official language, but Polynesian and Melanesian languages are also spoken by the indigenous population. New Caledonians are almost all Christians; about 65% are Roman Catholics, and there is a substantial Protestant minority. The capital is Nouméa, on the main island.

Recent History

New Caledonia became a French possession in 1853, when the island was annexed as a dependency of Tahiti. In 1884 a separate administration was established, and in 1946 it became an overseas territory of the French Republic. Early European settlers on New Caledonia, supported by legislation, quickly set about alienating Melanesian land, which provoked a number of rebellions by the indigenous population, the last being in 1917.

In 1956 the first Territorial Assembly, with 30 members, was elected by universal adult suffrage, although the French Governor effectively retained control of the functions of government. New Caledonian demands for a measure of self-government were answered in December 1976 by a new statute, which gave the Council of Government, elected from the Territorial Assembly, responsibility for certain internal affairs. The post of Governor was replaced by that of French High Commissioner to the territory. In 1978 the pro-independence parties obtained a majority of the posts in the Council of Government but, in March 1979, the French Government dismissed the Council, following its failure to support a proposal for a 10-year 'contract' between France and New Caledonia, because the plan did not acknowledge the possibility of New Caledonian independence. The territory was then placed under the direct authority of the High Commissioner. A general election was held in July, but a new electoral law, which affected mainly the Melanesian-supported, pro-independence parties, ensured that minor parties were not represented in the Assembly. Two parties loyal to France together won 22 of the 36 seats.

Tension grew sharply in September 1981 after the assassination of Pierre Declercq, Secretary-General of the pro-independence party Union calédonienne, and in November President Mitterrand of France called an urgent meeting of ministers in Paris to discuss the situation. Recognizing the need for major reforms, Henri Emmanuelli, the Secretary of State for Overseas Departments and Territories, outlined in December the immediate aims of the French Government, including fiscal reform, equal access for all New Caledonians to positions of authority, land reforms, the wider distribution of mining revenue and the fostering of Melanesian cultural institutions. To assist in effecting these reforms, the French Government simultaneously announced that it would rule by decree for a period of at least one year. In June 1982, accusing its partner in the ruling coalition of 'active resistance to evolution and change' in New Caledonia, the Fédération pour une nouvelle société calédonienne (FNSC) joined with the opposition Front indépendantiste (FI) to form a government which was more favourable to the proposed reforms.

In July 1983 the French Government held a meeting in Paris with representatives of the territory's main political groupings, and drew up a statute, providing for a five-year period of increased autonomy from July 1984 and a referendum in 1989 to determine New Caledonia's future, with independence as one of the options to be offered. The statute was opposed in New Caledonia, both by parties in favour of independence (because five years was considered too long to wait, given the possibility that a less sympathetic government might take over in France before 1989) and by those against, and it was rejected by the Territorial Assembly in April 1984. However, it was approved by the French National Assembly in September 1984. Under the provisions of the statute, the territorial Council of Ministers was responsible for many internal matters of government, its President henceforth being an elected member instead of the French High Commissioner; a second legislative chamber, with the right to be consulted on development planning and budgetary issues, was created at the same time. All of the main parties seeking independence, except the Libération kanake socialiste (LKS) party, which left the FI, boycotted elections for a new Territorial Assembly in November 1984 and, following the dissolution of the FI, formed a new movement called the Front de libération nationale kanake socialiste (FLNKS), whose congress instituted a 'provisional government', headed by Jean-Marie Tjibaou, on 1 December. The elections to the Territorial Assembly attracted only 50.12% of electors, and the anti-independence party Rassemblement pour la Calédonie dans la République (RPCR) won 34 of the 42 seats and 70.9% of the total vote. An escalation of violence by both kanaks (Melanesians) and caldoches (French settlers) began in November but, after a number of deaths had resulted, political leaders successfully appealed for peace.

In January 1985 Edgard Pisani, the new High Commissioner, announced a plan by which the territory might become independent 'in association with' France on 1 January 1986, subject to the result of a referendum in July 1985, in which all adults resident in the territory for at least three years would have the right to vote. A major obstacle to the success of such a plan was the fact that Melanesians constituted only 43% of the population of the territory, with people of European (37%) and other, mainly Asian and Pacific, origin accounting for the balance; Melanesian groups seeking independence had hitherto insisted that the indigenous population be allowed to determine its own fate. A resurgence of violence followed the announcement of Pisani's plan for a referendum on independence, and a state of emergency was declared after Eloi Machoro, a leading member of the FLNKS, was shot dead by police in an incident at La Foa, 65 km west of Nouméa. The renewed violence prompted President Mitterrand to make a brief visit to the territory later in the month.

Government

The French Government is represented in New Caledonia by its High Commissioner to the territory, and controls a number of important spheres of government, including defence, foreign diplomacy and justice. A local Territorial Assembly, with 42 members, is elected for a five-year term by universal adult suffrage. The Assembly may elect a President of an executive body, the territorial Council of Ministers, who, in turn, submits a list of between six and nine members of the Assembly to serve as Ministers, for approval by the Assembly.

A Regional Assembly, formed of 24 'custom' representatives and 24 representatives elected from among the members of the municipal councils, has a consultative role in social, economic and cultural matters.

In addition, New Caledonia elects two deputies to the French National Assembly, one delegate to the French Senate and one Economic and Social Councillor: all chosen on the basis of universal adult suffrage.

Defence

France was maintaining a force of 2,800 military personnel in New Caledonia in July 1984.

Economic Affairs

New Caledonia possesses about 30% of the world's known reserves of nickel, and is the third largest producer of the metal, after the USSR and Canada. Other metals present in the territory include chromium cobalt, iron, manganese, lead and zinc, but these are mined only spasmodically.

Nickel is the principal export commodity, accounting for 94.6% of total export revenue in 1980, the main customers being France (which took 45.4% of total exports in 1983) and Japan. Copra and coffee are also exported, and other important crops are cereals, potatoes, sweet potatoes, bananas, pawpaws and other fruits and vegetables. Cattle-farming is often able entirely to satisfy the territory's demand for beef.

New Caledonia's considerable dependence on the nickel industry has led to periods of economic depression, such as occurred in 1973, when demand for the product is low. Diversification of New Caledonia's economic activities, and enterprises producing import-substitutes, are encouraged by grants, subsidies and tax concessions, and the territory's 1984 budget provided for considerable expenditure on regional development, with attention to be paid to New Caledonia's infrastructure, agriculture, forestry and fisheries.

Inflation was 11.2% in 1983, but the budget was expected to have the effect of reducing it to 7% in 1984.

Transport and Communications

In 1982 there was a total of 5,443 km of roads in New Caledonia, of which 766 km were bitumen-surfaced. Nouméa is the territory's main seaport and also has an international airport. A well-developed internal network links Nouméa with other towns and islands by sea and air.

Social Welfare

In 1978 there were 34 hospitals in New Caledonia, with a total of 1,541 beds, and in 1979 there were 164 physicians working in the territory.

Education

Education is compulsory for 10 years between six and 16 years of age. Schools are operated by both the State and churches, under the supervision of the Department of Education. The French Government finances the state secondary system. In 1984 there were 278 primary schools (with 33,884 pupils), 41 secondary schools (with 12,481 pupils), 32 technical institutions (with 5,264 students) and five institutions of higher education (with 660 students). Work began in 1981 on a new university of technology in Nouméa, due eventually to serve 1,500 students. About 100 students attend universities in France.

Tourism

New Caledonia earned almost $A40m. from tourism in 1983, when 91,775 people visited the territory. In 1984 there were plans to foster a growth in the industry, mainly by attracting more visitors from Australia.

WALLIS AND FUTUNA ISLANDS

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Capital

The territory of Wallis and Futuna comprises two groups of islands: the Wallis Islands, including Wallis Island (also known as Uvea) and 22 islets on the surrounding reef, and, to the south-east, Futuna (or Hooru), comprising the two small islands of Futuna and Alofi. The islands are located north-east of Fiji and west of Western Samoa. Temperatures are generally between about 23°C (73°F) and 30°C (86°F), and there is a cyclone season between October and March. French and Wallisian, the indigenous Polynesian language, are spoken in the territory, and the entire population is nominally Roman Catholic. The capital is Mata-Utu, on Wallis Island.

Recent History

The first Europeans to discover Futuna and Alofi were Dutch navigators (in 1616) who named them the Hoorn Islands after the town from which they had sailed. The Wallis Islands were discovered by a British expedition, led by Samuel Wallis, in 1767. A French protectorate since 1888, the islands chose by referendum in December 1959 to become an overseas territory. In July 1961 they were granted this status.

Although there is no movement in Wallis and Futuna seeking secession of the territory from France (in contrast with the situation in the other French Pacific territories, French Polynesia and New Caledonia), the two kings whose kingdoms share the island of Futuna requested in November 1983, through the Territorial Assembly, that the island-groups of Wallis and Futuna become separate overseas territories of France, arguing that the administration and affairs of the territory had become excessively concentrated on Wallis Island.

Government

The territory of Wallis and Futuna is administered by a representative of the French Government, the Chief Administrator, who is assisted by an elected Territorial Assembly of 20 members. The three traditional kingdoms, from which the territory was formed, one on Wallis and two sharing Futuna, have equal rights, although the kings' powers are limited. In addition, the territory elects one deputy to the French National Assembly and one representative to the French Senate.

Economic Affairs

Most monetary income in Wallis and Futuna is derived from government employment and remittances sent home by islanders employed in New Caledonia. Copra and handicrafts are the only significant export commodities. Yams, taro, bananas, arrowroot and other food-crops are also cultivated.

Transport and Communications

Wallis Island has a few kilometres of road, one route circling the island, and a road runs along the southern coast of Futuna; the only surfaced roads are in Mata-Utu, the capital. Mata-Utu serves as the seaport of Wallis Island, while Sigave is the only port on Futuna. An international airport is situated on Wallis Island, from which internal flights are made to Futuna.

Social Welfare

In 1972 there were five state hospitals in Wallis and Futuna, with a total of 108 beds, and in 1974 there were three physicians working in the islands.

Education

In 1983 there were 13 state-financed primary and lower-secondary schools in Wallis and Futuna, with a total of 3,962 pupils.

GABON

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Gabonese Republic is an equatorial country on the west coast of Africa, with Equatorial Guinea and Cameroon to the north and the Congo to the south and east. The climate is tropical, with an average annual temperature of 26°C (79°F) and an average annual rainfall of 2,490 mm (98 in). The official language is French but Fang (in the north) and Bantu dialects (in the south) are widely spoken. About 60% of the population are Christians, mainly Roman Catholics. Most of the others follow animist beliefs. The national flag (proportions 4 by 3) has three equal horizontal stripes, of green, yellow and blue. The capital is Libreville.

Recent History

Formerly a province of French Equatorial Africa, Gabon gained internal autonomy in 1957. It achieved self-government, within the French Community, in November 1958 and attained full independence on 17 August 1960.

At the time of independence, there were two main political parties: the Bloc démocratique gabonaise (BDG), led by Léon M'Ba, and the Union démocratique et sociale gabonaise (UDSG), led by Jean-Hilaire Aubame. The two parties were almost evenly matched in support and neither had a majority in the National Assembly. However, with the backing of independent deputies, M'Ba became Prime Minister in 1958 and Head of State at independence. He favoured close relations with France, and his rule was generally conservative. Members of the UDSG joined the Council of Ministers after independence, and the two parties agreed on a joint list of candidates for elections in February 1961, when a new constitution came into effect. M'Ba was elected Gabon's first President, with 99.6% of the votes cast, and Aubame, his long-standing rival, became Minister for Foreign Affairs. The BDG wanted the two parties to merge but the UDSG resisted this proposal. As a result, all the UDSG ministers were forced to resign in February 1963. President M'Ba dissolved the National Assembly in January 1964, in preparation for new elections.

In February 1964, shortly before the planned elections, President M'Ba was deposed by a military coup, staged by army supporters of Aubame. However, French forces immediately intervened, and the M'Ba Government was restored. Aubame was found guilty of treason, and sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment. The elections were postponed until April 1964, when the BDG won 31 of the 47 seats in the National Assembly. The UDSG was formally outlawed and, over the next two years, almost all of the opposition members in the Assembly joined the BDG.

In February 1967, with President M'Ba in poor health, the constitution was revised to provide for the succession of a Vice-President if the President died or resigned. At the next elections, in March, there were no opposition candidates and the BDG was returned to power. President M'Ba was re-elected for a seven-year term, with Albert-Bernard Bongo, previously Deputy Prime Minister, as Vice-President. M'Ba died in November 1967 and was succeeded by Bongo, then aged 31. In March 1968 the Parti démocratique gabonais (PDG) was set up and one-party government was formally instituted.

In February 1973 Bongo was re-elected President. In September he announced his conversion to Islam, adopting the forename Omar. In April 1975 President Bongo abolished the Vice-Presidency, replacing it by a new post of Prime Minister. Accordingly, Léon Mébiame, who had been Vice-President since 1968, took office as Prime Minister. At the same time, local administration was reorganized to confer considerable autonomous powers on the provinces.

In 1977 President Kerekou of Benin accused Gabon of having aided an airborne mercenary attack on Cotonou. President Bongo strongly denied these accusations, and ordered the expulsion of all nationals of Benin from Gabon. Altogether, about 6,000 were expelled. In May 1981 several thousand Cameroonians resident in Gabon were airlifted back to Cameroon following violence against the Cameroonian communities in Libreville and Port-Gentil.

At a meeting of the PDG Congress in January 1979, elections were held to the party's Central Committee, thus introducing an element of democracy into Gabon's political system. Pressure was put upon President Bongo to increase efficiency in administration by controlling bureaucracy and by forbidding plurality of office.

Following his nomination by the PDG, President Bongo stood as the sole candidate in the presidential election held in December 1979, when he was re-elected for another seven-year term. Legislative and municipal elections were held in early 1980; for the first time since 1960, independents were free to stand against party candidates. All seats in the National Assembly were, none the less, won by members of the PDG. In a government reshuffle in November 1981, Bongo relinquished his ministerial posts and the title of Head of Government, now conferred upon the Prime Minister, Léon Mébiame. The post of Third Deputy Prime Minister was created in March 1983, and a further government reshuffle took place in March 1984.

President Bongo has taken a hard line against any form of protest or dissent in the country. An illegal opposition group, the Mouvement de redressement national (MORENA), emerged in November 1981, calling for the establishment of a multi-party system in Gabon. In November 1982 13 MORENA sympathizers, including a former government minister, were found guilty of crimes against the President and the state, and received severe sentences of hard labour. Speaking at the 16th anniversary of the founding of the PDG in March 1984, President Bongo vigorously reaffirmed his commitment to the continuation of one-party rule.

Under Gabon's liberal economic system, every effort has been made to attract foreign companies and investors to the country. Bongo has pursued a policy of close co-operation with France in the fields of economic and foreign affairs. Relations with France became strained in October 1983, however, as a result of the publication in Paris of a book which was critical of the Bongo regime, and a six-week ban on news pertaining to France was imposed on the Gabonese media. Tension was reduced following a visit to Libreville in April 1984 by the French Prime Minister, Pierre Mauroy, which resulted in a promise by France to supply Gabon with a 300 MW nuclear power station, the first in Black Africa. Relations between the two countries were finally restored in October 1984, when Bongo paid a three-day state visit to Paris. The President has, nevertheless, attempted to diversify Gabon's external relations, and in September 1984 he visited Japan, the Republic of Korea and Thailand, with a view to strengthening economic and political links with Asian countries.

Government

The 1961 Constitution, as subsequently revised, vests executive power in the President, elected by universal adult suffrage for seven years. The President appoints, and presides over, a Council of Ministers. The legislative organ is the unicameral National Assembly, with a term of five years. The Assembly has 93 members, of whom 84 are chosen by election and nine by nomination. Gabon became a one-party state in 1968. The country is divided into nine provinces, each under an appointed Governor, and 37 prefectures.

Defence

In July 1984 the army consisted of 3,900 men, the air force of 800 men, and the navy of 180 men. Paramilitary forces numbered 5,300 in 1984. France maintains a military detachment of 600 in Gabon. Estimated defence expenditure for 1981 was US $88.8m.

Economic Affairs

With abundant mineral resources and a relatively small population, Gabon is the richest country in sub-Saharan Africa, measured in terms of average income. In 1982, according to World Bank estimates, Gabon's GNP per head was US $4,000 (at average 1980–82 prices), having increased at an average rate of 4.4% annually, in real terms, since 1960.

More than one-half of the working population are engaged in subsistence agriculture, largely untouched by the expansion of the market economy. There is a little commercial agricultural production, the main crops being the oil palm, coffee, cocoa and bananas. Government plans to develop the rural sector are intended to halt the drift of population to urban areas and to reduce Gabon's dependence on imported foodstuffs. Imports of food and agricultural products represented 16.8% of the total import bill in 1982, compared with 11.7% in 1981.

Forests cover 82% of Gabon's land area, and for many years the economy was largely dependent upon forestry, particularly production of okoumé, a wood used in the making of plywood. Timber is Gabon's second most important export, accounting for 7.9% of exports in 1981 and 7.6% in 1982. Total timber production has been declining since 1977, however, and several forestry companies were in financial difficulties in the early 1980s. The lack of internal outlets, and international competition, as well as transport difficulties, mean that the wood industry is underdeveloped. The Transgabon railway, currently under construction, will allow previously inaccessible areas of forest to be exploited.

The economy is heavily dependent on petroleum, which provided 84% of export earnings in 1983. The petroleum price rises of 1974 coincided with peak production from Gabon's oilfields, but in 1977 output began to level off and recession set in, as economic expansion had proceeded more rapidly than the availability of finance. Gabon's annual output of crude petroleum was the fifth highest in Africa in 1976, at 11.3m. metric tons, but subsequently declined, reaching a low of 7.6m. tons in 1981. Increased exploration in recent years has led to recovery, however, and output was estimated at 8.5m. tons in 1984, owing to the coming 'on stream' of three new offshore deposits. Annual production is expected to reach 10m. tons by 1986.

Gabon is third in world production of manganese, and the deposits at Moanda constitute an estimated one-quarter of the world's known reserves (excluding the USSR). Output in 1980 was 2.3m. tons of high-grade ore, but production dropped to 1.5m. tons per year in 1981 and 1982, owing to recession in the world's steel industries. Production increased slightly in 1983, to 1.9m. tons, providing export revenue of 43,200m. francs CFA. There are also plans for the exploitation of major iron ore deposits at Belinga, in the north-east, on completion of the Transgabon rail link to the coast. The deposits contain an estimated 850m. tons of ore, with 64.5% metal content.

The exploitation of uranium deposits at Mounana began in 1961. Known reserves amount to 20 years' output at recently-achieved rates, and new deposits have been discovered at Boyindzi and Oklo. Production was 970 tons of uranium metal in 1982, and rose to 1,006 tons in 1983. The ore is extracted and concentrated by the Compagnie des Mines d'Uranium de Franceville (COMUF), a consortium largely controlled by French interests but with a 25% interest held by the Gabonese Government. New deposits of barytes, talc, lead, zinc, copper, gold and diamonds have also been discovered. A complete geological survey of the interior is to be carried out as part of a mineral development project.

Gabon's manufacturing sector is relatively restricted, though it is being expanded, and accounted for 6% of GDP in 1981. However, shortage of labour and a high minimum wage, together with inadequate infrastructure, have prevented further expansion. There are petroleum refineries at Port-Gentil and tanker facilities for vessels of up to 25,000 tons. Since July 1972 the 'Gabonization' of the economy has been undertaken. Foreigners have been replaced by Gabonese in positions of authority, and the state has taken a share in the capital of foreign companies.

An ambitious five-year plan was launched in 1976, of which the most important part was the Transgabon railway, the total construction cost of which was estimated at nearly 500,000m. francs CFA. By 1984 more than one-half of the railway's total track length of 900 km (560 miles) was nearing completion. Development of the railway is essential if Gabon is to be able to exploit efficiently the mineral deposits inland (uranium, manganese and iron ore) when petroleum reserves are exhausted. The development of both forestry and mining has been hampered by a lack of transport facilities. There is considerable potential for hydroelectric power in Gabon, and three hydroelectric power stations are currently in operation. An electricity and water supply programme was launched in 1984, with financial assistance from France and Canada. In April 1984 France agreed to supply Gabon with a 300 MW nuclear power station, a capacity large enough to produce double the country's electricity requirements.

Despite the country's valuable natural resources, Gabon's foreign debt was estimated to be 1,600m. French francs in 1978, largely attributable to over-stretching of resources when Gabon was host to the 1977 OAU summit. This has necessitated a policy of budgetary restraint. In 1978 about 58% of the budget went to the service of foreign debt, and the investment budget was cut back from 102,000m. francs CFA to 37,000m., while Gabon tried to reschedule its debts and to raise further long-term loans. Following the implementation of an IMF stabilization plan in 1978, the total debt fell by 15.5% in 1979, and the situation is continuing to improve. The cost of debt servicing is still heavy, however, and represented 38.3% of state expenditure in 1980, 36.3% in 1981 and 28% in 1982. In 1983 the balance of payments showed a current surplus of US $72m., compared with $319.9m. in the previous year and $401.8m. in 1981. Total imports rose by only two-thirds over the period 1977–82, to 255,800m. francs CFA, while petroleum exports more than doubled over the same period, to 544,300m. francs CFA. The trade surplus was 461,600m. francs CFA in 1983, compared with 413,500m. francs CFA in 1982, and 351,600m. francs CFA in 1981. Gabon's gross domestic product (GDP) increased from 974,000m. francs CFA in 1982 to 1,282,000m. francs CFA in 1983, showing a real growth rate of 2.3%. The petroleum sector accounted for 44% of GDP in 1983. The fifth Five-Year Plan (1984–88) aims to stabilize growth under a liberal but planned economy. Almost one-half of the proposed investment of 1,228,478m. francs CFA over the Plan period is to be spent on infrastructure projects. High priority is to be given to diversification of the country's productive sector, to offset the predicted decline in petroleum production. The forestry and fishing industries are to be substantially developed to provide for the 'post-oil era'. Under the 1985 budget, price 'freezes' were lifted in order to encourage investment in industry. However, the programme of economic austerity, begun in 1978, was to be maintained.

Transport and Communications

The first section of the Transgabon railway, from Owendo to Booué (325 km), begun in 1974, was inaugurated in January 1983. Two other sections will run from Booué to Belinga in the north (280 km) and to Franceville in the south (357 km). In 1981 there were 7,276 km of roads. The widespread forests make air transport very important, and the airport at Libreville is capable of handling jet airliners. There are also two other international airports, 65 smaller and 50 private airports. The main river is the Ogooué, navigable only from about 300 km (190 miles) inland. There are two ports on the Atlantic Ocean, at Libreville-Owendo and Port-Gentil.

Social Welfare

There is a national Fund for State Insurance, and a guaranteed minimum wage. In 1984 Gabon had 22 hospitals, 113 medical centres and 284 dispensaries. There were 5,774 hospital beds and 300 physicians. Maternal and infant health is a major priority.

Education

Education is officially compulsory for 10 years between six and 16 years of age. Primary and secondary education is provided by state and mission schools, and there is a university in Libreville. Primary education begins at the age of six and lasts for six years. Secondary education, beginning at 12 years of age, lasts for up to seven years. Many students go to France for university and technical training.

Tourism

Tourism is being extensively developed, with new hotels and several important projects, including a 'holiday village' near Libreville (opened in 1973), reorganization of Pointe-Denis tourist resort, and the promotion of national parks. There are approximately 2,000 hotel rooms. Tourist receipts in 1980 were estimated at US $13m.

Transport

RAILWAYS

The Transgabon railway, which will open up the densely-forested interior, was begun in 1974. The first phase, from Owendo (the port of Libreville) to Booué (325 km), was inaugurated in January 1983. The second phase, from Booué to Franceville (357 km) was begun in June 1982, and is expected to be in use by 1987. The construction of a 280-km spur from Booué to Belinga, to serve future iron ore mines in the north-east, is planned for the 1990s. At present, the manganese mine at Moanda is connected with Pointe-Noire (Congo) by a 76-km cableway and a 296-km railway.

A timber port came into operation at Owendo in 1979. There are also timber ports at Mayumba and Nyanga. Work was due to begin in 1983 on increasing capacity at Owendo to 500,000 metric tons per year; facilities for exporting manganese and iron are also planned. The construction of a deep-water port at Mayumba is planned. At mid-1981 the merchant shipping fleet had a total displacement of 78,000 grt, of which 74,000 grt were oil tankers.

THE GAMBIA

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of The Gambia is a narrow territory around the River Gambia on the coast of West Africa, surrounded on three sides by Senegal. The climate is tropical and, away from the river swamps, most of the country is savanna bush. The average annual temperature in the capital, Banjul, is 27°C (80°F). English is the official language, while the principal vernacular languages are Mandinka, Fula and Wolof. About 85% of the inhabitants are Muslims, and most of the remainder are Christians, with some adherents of animism. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) has red, blue and green horizontal stripes, with two narrow white stripes bordering the central blue band. The capital is Banjul (formerly called Bathurst).

Recent History

The Gambia was formerly a British dependency. It became a separate colony in 1888, having previously been united with Sierra Leone. The principle of election was introduced for the first time in the 1946 constitution. Political parties were formed in the 1950s, and another constitution was adopted in 1960. This was amended in April 1962, when the office of Premier was created. Following elections in May, the leader of the People's Progressive Party (PPP), Dr (later Sir) Dawda K. Jawara, took office as Premier in June 1962. Full internal self-government followed in October 1963.

On 18 February 1965 The Gambia became an independent country within the Commonwealth, with Dr Jawara as Prime Minister. On 24 April 1970 the country became a republic, with Sir Dawda Jawara as President. He was re-elected in 1972 and again in April 1977, when the PPP retained their 28 seats in the House of Representatives. In September 1978 the only United Party member remaining in the House of Representatives, following a by-election defeat in May 1977, joined the PPP, leaving only the five members of the National Convention Party (NCP) as opposition. Demands for the establishment of a one-party state, however, have always been rejected by President Jawara.

In October 1980 the Government was obliged to ask neighbouring Senegal to dispatch troops to The Gambia to assist in maintaining internal security under the terms of a mutual defence pact. A more serious threat was posed in July 1981, when a coup was staged during President Jawara's absence. Left-wing rebels formed a 12-man National Revolutionary Council and proclaimed their leader, Kukli Samba Sanyang, as Head of State. Senegalese troops again entered Banjul and quickly crushed the rebellion. A state of emergency was announced, and more than 1,000 people were arrested. During trials lasting until April 1984, 61 people were sentenced to death. However, 36 of the sentences were commuted upon appeal, and in early 1985 none of the executions had been carried out. The state of emergency was lifted in February 1985.

Plans were announced in August 1981 for the merger of The Gambia and Senegal, which had always had close links, in a confederation to be called Senegambia. These proposals were approved by the Gambian House of Representatives in December, and came into effect on 1 February 1982 (see p. 1695). The first Confederal Council of Ministers, headed by President Abdou Diouf of Senegal (with President Jawara as his deputy), was announced in November 1982. The two most important institutions of the Confederation, the Council of Ministers and the Confederal Parliament, held their inaugural meetings in January 1983. Subsequent meetings have led to agreements on co-ordination of foreign policy, communications and security; negotiations on economic and monetary union were in progress in 1985.

Legislative and presidential elections, held in May 1982, helped to restore The Gambia's democratic image and were interpreted by many as indicative of the popularity of the confederation scheme. Critics felt, however, that the country's political autonomy had been sacrificed to ensure the Government's survival. President Jawara was re-elected, this time by universal suffrage, gaining 137,020 votes, compared with 52,136 for the leader of the NCP, Sherif Mustapha Dibba, then in detention for his alleged involvement in the 1981 coup attempt (he was acquitted and released in June). The PPP won 27 of the 35 elective seats in the House of Representatives. Bakary Darbo, former High Commissioner to Senegal, was appointed Vice-President. The new Cabinet comprised a number of younger, reformist Ministers, including Fafa M'Bai, who, as Minister of Justice, instituted a series of anti-corruption measures. However, M'Bai resigned his post in June 1984 amid unconfirmed reports of financial misconduct.

Government

Legislative power is held by the unicameral House of Representatives, with 49 members: 35 directly elected by universal adult suffrage for five years; five Chiefs' Representatives Members elected by the Chiefs in Assembly; eight non-voting nominated members; and the Attorney-General. The President is elected by direct universal suffrage for a five-year term. He is Head of State and appoints a Vice-President (who is leader of government business in the House) and a Cabinet consisting of elected members of the House or other nominees.

Defence

Under the Senegambia confederation pact, which came into effect in February 1982, all armed forces were eventually to be integrated. The 400-strong paramilitary Gambian Field Force was disbanded following the abortive coup in 1981. A regular army is to be established by 1986; training by British military advisers began in June 1984. A national gendarmerie is to be formed by 1989. In November 1984 the Gambia National Army comprised fewer than 100 men. Military service is voluntary.

Economic Affairs

The economy is based on peasant cultivation of groundnuts, which normally provide more than 90% of export earnings. The Gambia is therefore particularly vulnerable to fluctuations in groundnut harvests and to changes in world prices. About 80% of the working population are engaged in agriculture. The major cash crops are groundnuts and cotton. Industrial activity is largely based on the processing of groundnuts, while beverages and construction materials are also produced. Groundnut production contributed 55% of GDP in 1982/83, compared with 61% in the previous year, while the hotels and restaurants sector and the fishing industry contributed 7.7% and 4.9% respectively in 1982/83. The Government has attempted to diversify the industrial sector in recent years, and in 1983 the Kanifing Industrial estate was set up outside Banjul. The fishing and livestock industries are being developed, with financial assistance from the African Development Bank. A cement plant was to be established in 1985, with an annual capacity of 100,000 metric tons. 'Gambianization' has gradually been introduced into all sectors of the economy except tourism, which remains almost exclusively under foreign control. Since 1981, however, foreign investment has been encouraged in other sectors, particularly horticulture and light industry. Food, machinery and other manufactured goods constitute the country's main import requirements.

Between 1977 and 1981 erratic rainfall badly affected crops, so that foreign aid, in the form of emergency food supplies, had to be provided. By 1980/81 groundnut production had fallen to its lowest level for 30 years, exports had declined sharply and there was a trade deficit of 218.4m. dalasi. Production recovered in 1981/82, however, and the trade deficit improved to 161.9m. dalasi in that year. It further improved to 132.7m. dalasi in 1982/83, as groundnut production rose to 128,000 tons. Renewed drought in 1983 severely affected the agricultural sector, and President Jawara appealed for aid from the international community to alleviate the food shortfall. Gross output of food grains declined from 104,000 tons in 1982/83 to 68,000 tons in 1983/84, while production of groundnuts dropped to 94,000 tons and cotton output was 50% lower than in 1982/83. The trade deficit increased to 153.8m. dalasi in 1983/84, owing mainly to higher prices for imported petroleum and the increased need for food imports, which totalled 34% of total imports in that year, compared with 25% in 1982/83. In February 1984 the President announced a 25% devaluation of the dalasi against the pound sterling, in an attempt to halt the downward spiral of the economy. A series of austerity measures was implemented, including a 'freeze' on wages, reductions in planned government spending and an increase in prices for basic commodities. The measures were taken in accordance with an agreement with the IMF, which in May 1984 approved a 15-month stand-by arrangement authorizing purchases by The Gambia of up to 12.83m. SDRs.

Inflation was estimated at 8.2% in 1981/82, rising to 10.2% in 1982/83. GDP rose to 594m. dalasi in 1982/83, a 21% increase over the previous year's 491m. dalasi, while GDP per head increased from 782 dalasi to 922 dalasi. According to World Bank estimates, GNP per head (at average 1980–82 prices) was US $360 in 1982, showing an average annual real growth rate of 2.5% over 1960–82.

Development programmes have been concerned mainly with improving and diversifying The Gambia's infrastructure. A five-year project, begun in 1976, emphasized rural development, irrigation, increased production of subsistence crops, including the Jahaly and Patcharr swamp rice project (which was to increase the irrigated area by 1,400 ha over five years), and the expansion of education and health facilities. By 1981 projects to increase cotton, livestock and fish production had come into effect, while studies for a joint desalination bridge-barrage with Senegal over the River Gambia were under way in 1983. By 1982 a total of US $51m. had been pledged for finance of the bridge-barrage by international agencies and the Federal Republic of Germany. The project will extend irrigated cultivation in The Gambia to 24,000 ha, and it is hoped that, as a result, the country will become a net exporter of rice. The Gambia currently produces only one-half of its requirements, and imported around 50,000 tons of rice in 1982/83. The Second Five-Year Plan (1981/82–1985/86) strongly emphasized agricultural development and improvements in social services. A total of 475m. dalasi was to be invested, and an annual increase in GNP of 5% was aimed for. A five-year urban renewal project was launched in 1984, aiming to upgrade around 450 ha of land in Banjul and neighbouring areas.

The Senegambian Confederation, inaugurated in February 1982 (see Recent History), is intended eventually to produce an economic and monetary union between Senegal and The Gambia, and the possible absorption of The Gambia into the West African Monetary Union (see p. 154).

Transport and Communications

The road network covered 3,083 km (1,916 miles) in 1981, and included 833 km (517 miles) of main roads and 250 km (155 miles) of secondary roads. About 15% of the total is paved; some roads can be used in all seasons, but in outlying parts they may be closed during the rains, from mid-July to early November. A road of 192 km (119 miles), opened in 1982, links Soma with Basse. There are no railways. However, the River Gambia is well suited to navigation. The port of Banjul receives about 300 ships annually, and there are intermittent sailings to and from North Africa, the Mediterranean and the Far East. The port was considerably enlarged in 1974. There is an international airport at Yundum, outside Banjul, which is being further developed.

Social Welfare

In 1978 there were 699 hospital beds. At the end of 1980 there were 43 government physicians, 23 private practitioners and five dentists. There were four hospitals and a network of 12 health centres, 17 dispensaries and 68 maternity and child welfare clinics throughout the country. A mother-and-child health scheme, primary health care, immunization and leprosy control programmes are being developed.

Education

Primary education, beginning at eight years of age, is free but not compulsory and lasts for six years. On completion of this period, pupils may sit an entrance examination, leading either to five years of secondary high school or to four years of secondary technical school. High schools offer an academic-based curriculum leading to examinations at the 'Ordinary' level of the General Certificate of Education (GCE), under the auspices of the West African Examinations Council. Two of the high schools provide two-year courses leading to GCE 'Advanced' level. Gambia College, at Brikama, offers post-secondary courses in teacher-training, agriculture and health; other post-secondary education is provided by technical training schools. Non-formal education services are being expanded to offer increased educational opportunities in rural areas, and to provide for primary school leavers who are unable to continue their studies. University and higher education must be obtained abroad. In 1981 an estimated 49% of children between eight and 13 years of age (63% of boys; 35% of girls) were enrolled at primary schools. Secondary enrolment in 1981 was equivalent to 14% of children aged 14 to 19 (19% of boys; 8% of girls). According to UNESCO estimates, adult illiteracy in 1980 averaged 79.9% (males 70.9%, females 88.4%). In 1977 The Gambia introduced Koranic studies in all stages of education.

Tourism

Tourism has been a major industry in The Gambia since 1971, and the Government is committed to its further expansion. It is now the second largest earner of foreign exchange, after agriculture. In 1980/81 The Gambia received 21,327 foreign visitors, but in 1981/82 arrivals fell to 16,962, owing to the world recession and the coup attempt in July 1981. A record 41,950 visitors arrived in 1983/84. There is a haven for bird watchers, and more than 400 species of birds have been recorded.

Judicial System

The judicial system of The Gambia is based on English Common Law and legislative enactments of the Republic's Parliament which include an Islamic Law Recognition Ordinance by which an Islamic Court exercises jurisdiction in certain cases between, or exclusively affecting, Muslims.

The Supreme Court: Consists of the chief justice and puisne judges; has unlimited jurisdiction; appeal lies to the Court of Appeal.

Chief Justice: Emmanuel Olayinka Ayoola.

The Gambia Court of Appeal: Established in 1961. It is the Superior Court of Record and consists of a president, justices of appeal and other judges of the Supreme Court ex officio. Final appeal, with certain exceptions, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the United Kingdom.

President (acting): S. J. Forster.

The Banjul Magistrates Court, the Kanifing Magistrates Court and the Divisional Courts: the subordinate courts are all courts of summary jurisdiction presided over by a magistrate or in his absence by two or more lay justices of the peace. In 1974 a system of travelling magistrates was introduced to help promote more effective administration of justice in the provinces. They have limited civil and criminal jurisdiction, and appeal lies from these courts to the Supreme Court.

Islamic Courts have jurisdiction in matters between, or exclusively affecting, Muslim Gambians and relating to civil status, marriage, succession, donations, testaments and guardianship. The Courts administer Islamic Law. A cadi, or a cadi and two assessors, preside over and constitute an Islamic Court. Assessors of the Islamic Courts are Justices of the Peace of Islamic faith.

District Tribunals are established by the government under the District Tribunals Act, 1933. These are appeal courts which deal with cases touching on customs and traditions. Each court consists of three district tribunal members, one of whom is selected as president, and other court members from the area over which it has jurisdiction.

GHANA

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Ghana lies on the west coast of Africa, with the Ivory Coast to the west and Togo to the east. It is bordered by Burkina Faso to the north. The climate is tropical, with temperatures generally between 21°C and 32°C (70°–90°F) and average annual rainfall of 2,000 mm (80 in) on the coast, decreasing inland. English is the official language, but there are eight major national languages. Many of the inhabitants follow traditional beliefs and customs. Christians make up an estimated 42% of the population. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) has three equal horizontal stripes, of red, gold and green, with a five-pointed black star in the centre of the gold stripe. The capital is Accra.

Recent History

Ghana was formed by a merger of the Gold Coast, a former British colony, and the British-administered part of Togoland, a UN Trust Territory.

In the Gold Coast a new constitution was issued in December 1950. The first general election to the new Legislative Assembly, held in February 1951, resulted in an overwhelming victory for the Convention People's Party (CPP), led by Dr Kwame Nkrumah, who became Prime Minister in March 1952. The CPP retained power in the 1954 and 1956 elections. In May 1956, by a UN-supervised plebiscite, British Togoland voted to join the Gold Coast in an independent state. Ghana was duly granted independence, within the Commonwealth, on 6 March 1957, and Dr Nkrumah continued in power. The country was the first British dependency in sub-Saharan Africa to become independent under majority rule. Dr Nkrumah established an authoritarian regime, aiming to lead Ghana towards 'African socialism', and played a leading role in the Non-Aligned Movement. Ghana became a republic on 1 July 1960, with Dr Nkrumah as President. In February 1964 the country became a one-party state, with the CPP as the sole authorized party. President Nkrumah modified his previous policy of non-alignment and established close relations with the USSR and other communist countries.

On 24 February 1966 President Nkrumah, whose repressive policies and financial mismanagement had caused increasing resentment, was deposed by the army and police while he was visiting the People's Republic of China. The coup leaders established the National Liberation Council (NLC), led by Gen. Joseph Ankrah. The NLC released many political prisoners, carried out a purge of CPP supporters in positions of authority, and took rigorous measures to cope with economic problems. In April 1969, following disputes within the ruling NLC, Gen. Ankrah was replaced by Brig. (later Lt-Gen.) Akwasi Afrifa, who implemented plans for a return to civilian government. After the introduction of a new constitution, which established a non-executive presidency, an election for a new National Assembly was held in August 1969. Of the 140 seats in the Assembly, 105 were won by the Progress Party (PP), led by Dr Kofi Busia, who was appointed Prime Minister in September. Although military rule ended and the PP Government took office on 1 October 1969, presidential power was held by a three-man commission, formed by NLC members, until 31 August 1970, when Edward Akufo-Addo was inaugurated as civilian President.

In the wake of increasing economic and political difficulties, the army seized power again in January 1972. The constitution was abolished and all political institutions were replaced by a National Redemption Council (NRC) under the chairmanship of Lt-Col (later Gen.) Ignatius Acheampong. In October 1975 supreme legislative and administrative authority was transferred from the NRC to a Supreme Military Council (SMC), also led by Gen. Acheampong.

In 1976 Gen. Acheampong put forward plans for a return to civilian rule without political parties, in the form of 'union' government, in which it was envisaged that the military should continue to play a role. Fears that this would amount only to a continuation of military rule, combined with increasing dissatisfaction with the economic situation and the prevalence of smuggling and profiteering, led to unrest. In response, the Government announced a definite programme for return to civilian government by July 1979, beginning with a referendum held in March 1978, which resulted in a vote of 54% in favour of Union Government. This result was, however, largely discredited.

In July 1978 Acheampong's deputy, Lt-Gen. Frederick Akuffo, assumed power in a bloodless coup and declared that the return to a popularly elected government would take place in July 1979, as planned. He introduced a number of civilians into the NRC and freed many political prisoners. In December a Constituent Assembly was set up to decide on the form of the new constitution. The six-year ban on party politics was lifted in January 1979, and 16 new parties were subsequently registered.

Only a fortnight before the elections were due to take place, a coup was staged by junior officers of the armed forces, led by Flight-Lt Jerry Rawlings. Their main grievance was the fact that Ghana's military, past and present, were evidently not going to be held responsible for the economic mismanagement and widespread corruption of recent times: the new draft constitution granted former rulers immunity from financial investigation. Under Rawlings, an Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) took over power and began a 'house-cleaning exercise' to stamp out kalabule (corruption) at all levels. A 'Revolutionary Court' found Acheampong, Akuffo, Afrifa and six other senior officers guilty of corruption, and they were executed. Although the return to civilian rule was postponed until September 1979, the elections took place in June as planned. The People's National Party (PNP) gained a majority of parliamentary seats, and its leader, Dr Hilla Limann, was elected President, taking office on 24 September 1979.

During the next two years the Government took measures to improve the chronic food shortages, to stamp out corruption and smuggling at all levels and to stem civil and tribal unrest. In October 1980, however, the United National Convention (UNC) ended its alliance with the PNP, accusing the latter of ineptitude. As a result, the PNP had a majority of only one seat in Parliament. In June 1981 the UNC joined three other parties to form the All People's Party, a viable alternative to the PNP.

Dissatisfaction with the Government came to a head in December 1981, when Flight-Lt Rawlings once again took power in a military coup and established a Provisional National Defence Council (PNDC), with himself as Chairman. The Council of State was abolished, the Constitution suspended, Parliament dissolved and political parties banned. City and district councils were dissolved in March 1982 and replaced by People's Defence Committees (PDCs), designed to give the people a voice in the government of Ghana. The PDCs aimed to expose and deal with corruption, to maintain discipline and to 'protect the aims of the revolution'. In 1984 the PNDC announced its intention of organizing local elections to reconstitute the city and district councils, which would become the lowest units of government administration. The elections were to be held in 1985.

The PNDC's policies initially received strong support from students and industrial workers, but discontent with the regime and the apparent ineffectiveness of its economic policies took the form of a series of attempted coups, all involving military personnel. In 1983 students became increasingly dissatisfied with the regime, and a number of violent street demonstrations took place. Legon University was occupied in May, and subsequently closed by pro-government workers, and Kumasi University was also shut, following clashes between workers and students who were protesting about price rises. Both universities remained closed until March 1984.

In the early months of 1983 an estimated 1m. Ghanaians returned from Nigeria, following a mass expulsion of illegal immigrants. This sudden influx of homeless and unemployed persons placed a considerable strain on the already ailing economy—their evacuation alone cost the Government some C45m.—but this was partly offset by foreign aid in the form of food and medical supplies. Refugees were encouraged to return to their home villages, and to take up agricultural occupations, in order to avoid increased overcrowding in the urban centres.

Government

Upon its accession to power on 31 December 1981, the PNDC dissolved Parliament, abolished the Council of State and suspended the 1979 Constitution. Executive and legislative powers are vested in the PNDC, which rules by decree.

Defence

In July 1984 Ghana had total armed forces of 12,600 (army 10,000, navy 1,200 and air force 1,400). There is a paramilitary force of 5,000 and three Border Guard battalions. Defence expenditure was US $141m. in 1981. The headquarters of the Defence Commission of the OAU is in Accra.

Economic Affairs

In 1982, according to estimates by the World Bank, Ghana's gross national product (GNP) per head, measured at average 1980–82 prices, was US $360. It was estimated that GNP per head declined, in real terms, at an average rate of 1.3% per year between 1960 and 1982. Ghana's overall gross domestic product (GDP), measured in constant prices, increased at an average of 2.2% annually in 1960–70 but declined by 0.5% per year in 1970–82.

Ghana is primarily an agricultural country. Agriculture employs nearly 70% of the working population and accounts for over one-half of the country's GDP. Only 11% of the land area is cultivated, half of which is used to grow cocoa, the country's principal commercial crop, which generally provides around 60% export earnings. Ghana's cocoa crop has been declining since the early 1970s, and estimated output fell from 470,000 metric tons in 1971/72 to about 250,000 tons in 1982/83, owing to ageing and diseased trees, poor transport facilities, and considerable smuggling across Ghana's borders. The price at which cocoa is purchased from producers was tripled in 1981 as an incentive to farmers, and in the following year the Rawlings Government formed a student task force to evacuate cocoa from the interior, and closed land borders to prevent smuggling. In 1983 the cocoa crop was ravaged by drought and fires: 35%–40% of the farms were destroyed, and the crop for 1983/84 was 158,000 tons. In response, the Government launched a plan to encourage the redevelopment of the cocoa industry: farmers were offered cash incentives to replant crops, the producer price was raised by 67%, and new crop-spraying machinery and insecticides were imported. The Government estimated that the scheme would increase cocoa output by 25% in its first year and by 40% in its second year. However, the estimated crop for 1984/85 was only 185,000 tons. Production of foodstuffs has suffered in recent years from adverse weather conditions and economic mismanagement. In 1983 and 1984 the Government was forced to appeal to the international community for emergency food aid to overcome the shortfall in food production. Donor countries supplied 192,000 metric tons of cereals in 1983, and 257,000 tons in 1984.

The timber and mining industries, although estimated to be working at only 25% capacity, are next in importance after agriculture, with gold, bauxite, diamonds and hardwoods as major sources of foreign exchange. In 1981 a project was adopted to revitalize the ailing gold-mining industry, as production had slumped to 5,000 troy ounces per month from 15,000 in the 1970s. There is considerable state participation in the major sectors of the economy. Ghana is seeking to develop its energy resources: offshore petroleum was discovered in 1970 and natural gas in 1980. Oil production started from the Saltpond field in January 1979, and by 1984 production of crude oil had reached 1,200 barrels per day, equivalent to 7% of the country's needs. The Ghana National Petroleum Corporation was established in 1983 to explore areas not covered by agreement with foreign companies. In 1984, the Government announced that the country's largest petroleum refinery, at Tema, was to be rehabilitated and enlarged to cope with increased petroleum production.

Political instability and general mismanagement have had a disastrous effect on the economy. In recent years there have been heavy balance-of-payments deficits, a rapidly increasing money supply (rising by 64.7% in 1981) and a high rate of inflation, averaging 116.5% in 1981, 22.3% in 1982 and 122.9% in 1983. Contributory factors include an artificially high exchange rate, over-reliance on imports, (especially petroleum), shortages of raw materials and spare parts, the decline in world prices and markets, inadequate marketing, storage and distribution facilities and smuggling.

The Rawlings Government introduced price controls in February 1982 and suspended the 1981/82 budget, since a deficit of 8,000m. cedis was foreseen. Government spending was severely curtailed. By June 1982 the foreign debt stood at 1,555m. cedis, with foreign exchange reserves totalling only 271.4m. Negotiations for IMF assistance were resumed in October, but the Government was unwilling to accept a further devaluation of the cedi, which was being sold on the 'black market' at only one-twentieth of its official value. A 'Green Revolution' was launched to reduce Ghana's dependence on imported foodstuffs, while foreign-exchange earners were to be rehabilitated and imports severely restricted.

In the 1983 budget the Government announced a new system of bonuses and surcharges on foreign exchange transactions. Users of foreign exchange were to be taxed in order to finance bonuses for earners of foreign exchange, but the system amounted to a multiple exchange rate for the cedi. A budget deficit of $739.9m. for 1983/84 was forecast. Ghana continued to negotiate for IMF aid in 1983, and an agreement was eventually reached in August of that year. Ghana was granted $253.6m. in stand-by payments and $128.1m. from the compensatory financing facility to make up for the fall in export earnings. A compromise was reached on the question of the devaluation of the cedi. The IMF provisionally accepted Ghana's new foreign exchange system, but insisted that Ghana should unify the exchange rate and devalue the cedi within a year of the agreement. The cedi was subsequently devalued by more than 90% in November 1983, and three further devaluations were made in 1984. The IMF authorized a further stand-by arrangement of SDR 180m. in August 1984. In November 1983 the Government launched a three-year economic recovery programme, for which it required US $700m. in external aid. The programme consisted of a wide-ranging set of reforms, including movement towards a more realistic exchange rate and gradual easing of price controls. An international donors' conference was held in Paris, at which pledges for $150m. were received for the first year of the programme; a second conference was held in December 1984, and raised pledges for $450m. for 1985.

The budget for 1984 was announced in March of that year, and raised the minimum daily wage by 60% to 40 cedis, contributing to an increased budget deficit, which was forecast at 5,900m. cedis. The budget gave priority to the transport, energy and manufacturing sectors, which all received increased allocations. Export earnings were forecast to rise to $641.2m. in 1984, owing to higher earnings from cocoa exports.

Ghana is a member of ECOWAS (see p. 134). Overseas aid comes mainly from the EEC, particularly the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany, and also the UN, the People's Republic of China, Canada and the USA.

Transport and Communications

The rail network of 953 km (592 miles) forms a rough triangle linking Accra and Takoradi on the coast with the inland centre of Kumasi. Ghana has some 32,200 km of roads, but only about one-quarter is paved. The Ghana Highway Authority co-ordinates and administers improvements to both trunk and feeder roads. National air and shipping lines have been formed.

Social Welfare

The Government provides hospitals and medical care at nominal rates, and there is a government pension scheme. There were 293 hospitals, health centres and posts and 60 private clinics in 1982. Physicians numbered 1,300 and nurses 11,642 in 1980. The Department of Social Welfare and Community Development and the Department of Rural Development deal with both urban and rural problems, including the need to improve literacy, child welfare and factory legislation.

Education

In April 1974 the NRC announced the introduction of a new educational structure, consisting of an initial phase of six years' primary education (beginning at six years of age), followed by three years' junior secondary education. All this schooling is free and, officially, compulsory. At the junior secondary schools a selection is made between senior secondary school courses, leading to examinations at the 'Ordinary ' level of the General Certificate of Education, and technical and vocational courses. Enrolment at primary schools in 1979 was equivalent to 69% of children in the relevant age-group (77% of boys; 60% of girls). There are three universities. The military regime that assumed power in December 1981 stressed the need for education to be geared more closely to the country's practical needs. The adult illiteracy rate in 1970 was 69.8%.

Tourism

Ghana's tourist industry is expanding. The attractions include fine beaches, game reserves, traditional festivals and old trading forts and castles. In 1980 revenue from tourism was about 21.2m. cedis, and in 1981 there were an estimated 42,403 visitors. There were 2,220 hotel beds in 1980.

Public Holidays

1985: 1 July (Republic Day), 25–26 December (Christmas), 31 December (Revolution Day).

1986: 1 January (New Year's Day), 6 March (Independence Day), 28–31 March (Easter).

Judicial System

The civil law in force in Ghana is based on the Common Law, doctrines of equity and general statutes which were in force in England in 1874, as modified by subsequent Ordinances. Ghanaian customary law is, however, the basis of most personal, domestic and contractual relationships. Criminal Law is based on the Criminal Code, enacted in 1960 and dependent on English Criminal Law, and since amended at intervals. The Superior Court of Judicature consists of the Supreme Court, the Court of Appeal and the High Court of Justice; the Inferior Courts include the Circuit Courts, the District Courts and such other inferior courts as may be provided by law.

Supreme Court: The Supreme Court consists of the Chief Justice and not fewer than four other Justices of the Supreme Court. It is the final court of appeal in Ghana and has jurisdiction in matters relating to the enforcement or interpretation of the Constitution.

Chief Justice: F. K. Apaloo.

The Court of Appeal: The Court of Appeal consists of the Chief Justice and not fewer than five Judges of the Court of Appeal. It has jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals from any judgment, decree or order of the High Court.

The High Court: The High Court of Ghana consists of the Chief Justice and not fewer than twelve Justices of the High Court and has an original jurisdiction in all matters, civil and criminal, other than those for offences involving treason. Trial by jury is practised in criminal cases in Ghana and the Criminal Procedure Code, 1960, provides that all trials on indictment shall be by a jury or with the aid of Assessors.

The Circuit Court: Circuit Courts were created in 1960, and the jurisdiction of a Circuit Court consists of an original jurisdiction in civil matters where the amount involved does not exceed C100,000. It also has jurisdiction with regard to the guardianship and custody of infants, and original jurisdiction in all criminal cases, except offences where the maximum punishment is death or the offence, treason. Finally it has appellate jurisdiction from decisions of any District Court situated within its circuit.

District Courts: To each magisterial district is assigned at least one District Magistrate who has original jurisdiction to try civil suits in which the amount involved does not exceed C50,000. District Magistrates also have jurisdiction to deal with all criminal cases, except first-degree felonies, and commit cases of a more serious nature to either the Circuit Court or the High Court. A Grade I Circuit Court can impose a fine not exceeding C1,000 and sentences of imprisonment of up to two years and a Grade II Circuit Court may impose a fine not exceeding C500 and a sentence of imprisonment of up to 12 months. A District Court has no appellate jurisdiction, except in rent matters under the Rent Act.

Juvenile Courts: Empowered to hear charges against juveniles, persons under 17 years, except where the juvenile is charged jointly with an adult. They consist of a Chairman who must be either the District Magistrate or a lawyer, and not fewer than two other members appointed by the Chief Justice in consultation with the Judicial Council. The public is excluded from proceedings of Juvenile Courts which can make orders as to the protection and supervision of a neglected child and can negotiate with parents to secure the good behaviour of a child.

Public Tribunals: Set up by the PNDC in 1982 to judge criminal offences relating to prices, rent or exchange control, theft, fraud, forgery, corruption or any offence under any enactment which may be referred to them by the PNDC.

Special Military Tribunal: Set up by the PNDC in 1982 to judge crimes committed by members of the armed forces. It consists of between seven and five members.

Religion

According to the 1960 census, the distribution of religious groups was Christians 42.8%, traditional religions 38.2%, Muslims 12.0% and 7.0% unclassified.

GRENADA

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

Grenada, a mountainous, heavily-forested island, is the most southerly of the Windward Islands, in the West Indies. The country also includes some of the small islands known as the Grenadines, which lie to the north of Grenada. The largest of these is the low-lying island of Carriacou. The climate is semi-tropical, with an average annual temperature of 28°C (82°F) in the lowlands. Annual rainfall averages about 1,500 mm (60 in) in the coastal area and 3,800 mm to 5,100 mm (150–200 in) in mountain areas. Most of the rainfall occurs between June and December. The majority of the population speak English, although a French patois is also spoken. The main religion is Roman Catholicism but other Christian churches are also represented. The national flag (proportions 2 by 1) consists of a diagonally-quartered rectangle (yellow in the upper and lower segments, green in the right and left ones) surrounded by a red border bearing six five-pointed yellow stars (three above, three below). There is a red disc, containing a large yellow star, in the centre, and a representation of a nutmeg (in yellow and red) on the green segment near the hoist. The capital is St George's.

Recent History

Grenada was initially colonized by the French but was captured by the British in 1762. British control was recognized in 1783 by the Treaty of Versailles. Grenada continued as a British colony until 1958, when it joined the Federation of the West Indies, remaining a member until the dissolution of the Federation in 1962. Full internal self-government and statehood in association with the United Kingdom were achieved in March 1967. During this period, the political life of Grenada was dominated by Eric Gairy, a local trade union leader, who in 1950 founded the Grenada United Labour Party (GULP), with the support of an associated trade union. In 1951 GULP won a majority of the elected seats on the Legislative Council but in 1957 it was defeated by the Grenada National Party (GNP), led by Herbert Blaize. Gairy was Chief Minister in 1961–62 but was removed from office by the British, and the Constitution suspended, after allegations of corruption. In the subsequent elections the GNP gained a majority of the elected seats, and Blaize became Chief Minister again. Gairy became Premier after the elections of 1967 and again after those of 1972, which he fought chiefly on the issue of total independence. Grenada became independent, within the Commonwealth, on 7 February 1974, with Gairy as Prime Minister. Opposition to Gairy within the country was expressed in demonstrations and a general strike, and the formation, by the three opposition parties, of the People's Alliance, which contested the 1976 general elections and reduced GULP's majority in the Lower House. The alliance comprised the GNP, the United People's Party and the New Jewel Movement (NJM).

The rule of Sir Eric Gairy, who was knighted in June 1977, was regarded by the opposition as increasingly autocratic and corrupt, and on 13 March 1979 he was replaced in a bloodless coup by the leader of the left-wing NJM, Maurice Bishop. The new People's Revolutionary Government (PRG) suspended the 1974 Constitution and announced the imminent formation of a People's Consultative Assembly to draft a new constitution. Meanwhile, Grenada remained a monarchy, with the British Queen as Head of State, represented in Grenada by a Governor-General. Sir Paul Scoon, who had been appointed Governor-General in 1978 (on Gairy's recommendation), remained in office. General elections were promised, and detainees, including former ministers from the Gairy administration, were to be tried as soon as possible. The PRG pledged a non-aligned foreign policy and committed itself to solving the country's economic problems. In May 1980 an ultra-leftist coup plot was discovered, followed by an assassination attempt against Maurice Bishop and other members of the PRG in June and an escalation of anti-government violence in the latter part of the year. Restrictions against the privately-owned press were imposed, and in 1979 and 1981 two newspapers were closed down by the Government, which accused the owners of involvement in a destabilization campaign. This led in June 1981 to the banning of the launch of any new newspapers for a year. Bishop appealed for help to the UN and foreign governments in July, when he became convinced that manoeuvres by US forces off Puerto Rico were part of US preparations for an invasion of Grenada; this was strongly denied by the USA.

By mid-1982 relations with the USA, the United Kingdom and the more conservative members of Caricom were becoming increasingly strained: elections had not been arranged, many detainees were still awaiting trial, and Grenada was aligning more closely with Cuba and the USSR. Cuba was supplying about 40% of the funds, and several hundred construction workers, for the controversial airport at Point Salines, a project which further fuelled the USA's insistence that Grenada was to become a major staging-post for Soviet manoeuvres in the area. In November 1982 about 30 political prisoners were released, including former ministers of the Gairy administration.

In March 1983 the PRG again announced its fears that the USA was planning an invasion, and the armed forces were put on alert. The USA strenuously denied these allegations. In June Maurice Bishop sought to improve relations with the USA, and announced the appointment of a commission to draft a new constitution. This conciliation attempt was not popular with the more left-wing members of the PRG cabinet, who regarded Bishop's actions as an ideological betrayal. This division within the Government erupted in October into a power struggle between Bishop and his deputy, Bernard Coard, the Minister of Finance and Planning. On 13 October Bishop was placed under house arrest, allegedly for his refusal to share power with Coard. Official radio reports stated that Coard had resigned following claims that he was involved in a plot to murder Bishop. Four days later, Gen. Hudson Austin, the commander of the People's Revolutionary Army (PRA), announced that Bishop had been expelled from the NJM. On 19 October thousands of Bishop's supporters, incensed by this news, stormed the house, freed Bishop from imprisonment, and demonstrated outside the PRA headquarters. Violence ensued, with PRA forces firing into the crowd. Later in the day, Bishop, three of his ministers and three trade union spokesmen were all executed. A military coup had taken place, and the Government was replaced by a 16-man Revolutionary Military Council (RMC), led by Gen. Austin. The remaining NJM ministers were arrested and imprisoned, and a total curfew was imposed.

Regional and international outrage at the assassination of Bishop, plus fears of a US military intervention, were so intense that, after four days, the RMC relaxed the curfew, reopened the airport and promised to return to civilian rule as soon as possible. However, Sir Paul Scoon, the Governor-General, requested the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States (OECS, see p. 113) to intervene and to restore democratic order. The OECS asked for help from the USA, which, already concerned for the safety of some 1,000 US citizens on the island and convinced that Cuba and the USSR were behind the RMC's actions, readily complied. On 25 October about 1,900 US military personnel invaded the island, accompanied by 300 troops from Jamaica, Barbados and member-countries of the OECS. Fighting continued for some days, and the USA gradually increased its troop strength to a peak of 7,355 on 31 October, with further reinforcements waiting off shore with a US naval task force. Bernard Coard, Gen. Hudson Austin and others who had been involved in the coup were captured and imprisoned on the island. In January 1984 a total of 47 detainees were awaiting trial. Casualty figures for military personnel gave the following totals: 18 US soldiers, 24 Cubans and 16 Grenadians were killed in action; and 113 US troops, 57 Cubans and 280

Grenadians were wounded. The total number of civilians who were killed or wounded is unknown.

On 9 November Sir Paul Scoon appointed a non-political interim council to assume responsibility for the government of the country until elections could be held. Nicholas Braithwaite, a former Commonwealth official, was appointed Chairman in December. The 1974 Constitution was reinstated, and an electoral commission created to prepare for elections, which were to be held within 12 months and which would be open to any political parties. The USA began a gradual withdrawal of troops in mid-November, and by mid-December only 300 support troops were left, comprising military police and technicians who were to help the 430 members of Caribbean forces who remained on the island: numbers which remained constant throughout 1984. A police force was to be set up, including a paramilitary element which was to be the new defence contingent. The Interim Government pledged itself to restoring the country's economic equilibrium and democratic institutions, and in February 1984 it appealed to foreign governments for US $150m. in assistance for the next two years.

Several political parties, which had gone underground or into exile during the rule of the PRG, re-emerged and announced their intention of contesting the elections for a new House of Representatives. Sir Eric Gairy returned to Grenada in January 1984 to lead his GULP, although he stated that he would not stand as a candidate himself. In March three former NJM ministers launched the Maurice Bishop Foundation, designed as a focus of support for the Bishop faction of the former PRG. In May they formed the Maurice Bishop Patriotic Movement (MBPM) to contest the elections. A number of parties emerged, broadly occupying the centre of the political spectrum, including the Grenada National Party (GNP), led by Herbert Blaize; the Grenada Democratic Movement (GDM), led by Dr Francis Alexis; the National Democratic Party (NDP), led by George Brizan; and the Christian Democratic Labour Party (CDLP), led by Winston Whyte. Fears that a divided opposition would allow GULP to win a majority of seats in the new House led to negotiations between the centre parties to form an electoral alliance. In April the GNP, NDP and GDM agreed to form an informal coalition, to be known as the Team for National Togetherness. However, subsequent disagreements over the leadership and the selection of candidates led to the break-up of the alliance a month later. Preliminary hearings against the detainees, who had been charged with murder and conspiracy against Bishop and seven of his associates, opened in June, and 19 were committed to trial before the Grenada High Court. However, when the trial eventually began in November it was adjourned until February 1985. In response to US apprehension over growing support for GULP, a meeting between the GNP, GDM, NDP and CDLP was arranged at the end of August 1984 on Union Island, and attended by the Prime Ministers of Barbados, Saint Lucia and Saint Vincent. The result was the agreed merger of the parties to form the New National Party (NNP), to be led by Herbert Blaize. The CDLP, however, soon left the new party, and there were some fears over the cohesion of the new grouping.

In the general election, held on 3 December, the NNP achieved a convincing victory over its opponents by winning 14 of the 15 seats in the House of Representatives, and 59% of the popular vote. Both Sir Eric Gairy and the MBPM claimed that the poll had been fraudulent, and the one successful GULP candidate resigned his seat in protest. Blaize became Prime Minister, and announced a seven-member cabinet, which included Brizan and Alexis. He also asked the remaining US and Caribbean troops on the island to stay, at least until March 1985, and stressed the need for national reconciliation.

Government

Grenada has dominion status within the Commonwealth. The British monarch is Head of State and is represented locally by a Governor-General. Executive power is held by the Cabinet, led by the Prime Minister. Parliament comprises the Senate, made up of 13 Senators appointed by the Governor-General on the advice of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, and the 15-member House of Representatives, elected by universal adult suffrage. The Cabinet is responsible to Parliament.

Defence

A police force, comprising a paramilitary element, was set up in late 1983. It was expected that there would be more than 600 fully-trained officers by 1986. Called 'The Royal Grenadian Police Force' and trained by British officers, the force will be unarmed and modelled on the British system.

Economic Affairs

According to estimates by the World Bank, Grenada's GNP per head (at average 1979–81 prices) was US $780 in 1980, rising to $850 in 1981. Between 1960 and 1980 the country's GNP per head increased, in real terms, by an average of 1.7% annually. For the 1970–80 decade alone, however, it fell by 0.6% per year.

The economy of Grenada is essentially agricultural and centres on the traditional production of spices, particularly nutmeg. The principal exports are nutmeg, cocoa and bananas, although mace, cotton, coffee, coconuts, citrus fruit and minor spices are also significant. Agriculture contributes about 30% of GDP. Since the early 1970s, however, Grenada's agricultural exports have been seriously affected by a combination of natural disasters and low international commodity prices. The ravages since 1978 of the banana disease, moko, combined with flooding in 1979 and hurricane and storm damage in 1980 and 1981, have damaged the plantations, while export shipments were suspended in 1983 because of the political crisis. Record levels of production in 1982 corresponded with world-wide over-production and stockpiling, causing depressed international prices and a reduction in Grenada's export income. Earnings from cocoa exports fell from EC $18m. in 1981 to EC $12.5m. in 1982, while banana exports fell from EC $10m. to EC $9.1m. In 1983 nutmeg provided 35% of income, helped by a five-year trade agreement with the USSR, signed in 1982. However, this agreement was subsequently broken by the Interim Government, and low prices and the Indonesian monopoly of the market led to the stockpiling of 6m. lb during 1984, representing six months' production. Sugar cane and a wide variety of fruit and vegetables are also grown for local consumption. There are extensive forested areas in the interior of the country. Land tenure is based on privately-owned smallholdings and local co-operative ventures, and a number of the 47 state-run farms are being returned to private ownership. Livestock production is important for local consumption, though meat and milk still have to be imported. Cuba and the USSR provided some equipment and expertise to develop Grenada's fishing industry. In 1980 a fish-processing plant was established, and in 1981 the Government formed a National Fishing Company.

The development of manufacturing industries has not kept pace with other activities, owing mainly to the limited local market. Industry centres on the processing of agricultural products, and cottage industries producing garments and spice-based goods for the export market. Anticipated investment by American businessmen in light industry on the island, taking advantage of the benefits of the US Government's Caribbean Basin Initiative (CBI), has so far failed to materialize. Taxes on company profits and customs duties remain high when compared to other Caribbean islands, and Grenada's infrastructure is poor. Tourism is an important sector of the economy but, because of political upheaval, visitors have shown a preference for other islands. In 1981 only 82,300 tourists arrived, compared with 148,667 in 1978. However, it was hoped that the completion of the new Point Salines Airport, and the refurbishment and expansion of the island's hotels, would stimulate a revival in the tourist trade, especially among stay-over visitors, who numbered only 32,459 in 1983. The NJM Government's economic policy was based on the development of agro-industries and fisheries, geared to import substitution, and the promotion of tourism.

Unemployment fell from 49% in 1979 to 35% in 1980, and to 22% in 1982, mainly as a consequence of the PRG's expansion of the armed forces, and the development of youth and community projects. The disbanding of the army, and the suspension of the projects by the Interim Government, helped to cause a rise in unemployment, estimated to be over 30% by the end of 1984. The trade deficit rose from EC $109m. in 1981 to EC $124.7m. in 1982, as a result of the low prices for Grenada's agricultural exports. Expenditure of EC $70m. in 1981 on capital projects was raised largely from foreign aid donors, and the IMF granted a one-year stand-by credit of 3,425,000 SDRs to support the Government's financial programme. Major co-operation agreements were signed with Canada and Mexico in 1981, and substantial Cuban and Soviet aid for 1982 was directed primarily at development of infrastructure. In 1983 the IMF agreed further funds of US $14.1m. but this was withdrawn because of political instability in late 1983. Heavy expenditure on the new airport had pushed the level of capital expenditure to EC $145m. in the 1983 budget, and funds for recurrent expenditure were diverted towards the airport project, producing an increased burden of debt and interest payments, which rose from an equivalent of 16.5% of GDP in 1980 to 42% by the end of 1983. Expenditure was reduced by 17% in the 1984/85 budget, introduced by the Interim Government. The projected budget deficit of EC $31.8m., however, will be largely offset by US aid, totalling US $57.2m. for the 1984/85 financial year. In addition, US $3m. was provided in November 1983 as emergency aid, and $6m. as compensation for war damage. Further payments have been promised for longer-term capital projects.

Foreign aid has been provided, and more promised, for the reconstruction of roads, buildings and other infrastructural necessities. In February 1984 the US Government agreed to provide US $21m. towards the completion of the Point Salines Airport, and further sums for the repair of roads and the telephone system, damaged during the fighting. Canada's aid has included US $6m. for the new airport, while the United Kingdom has provided US $2.5m. in loans, partly for the improvement of the island's electricity generating capacity, the inadequacy of which causes frequent power cuts.

Transport and Communications

Grenada has about 980 km (610 miles) of roads, of which 766 km (476 miles) are suitable for motor traffic. A new highway linking St Andrew's, St David's and St George's was constructed in 1979. A programme of further road construction was hampered by military activity in October 1983, and the USA has granted US $15m. in emergency aid to repair infrastructure. Work began immediately on the highway from St George's to Point Salines airport, which was badly damaged. Several foreign shipping lines serve the island, and there is an airport at Pearls, 30 km (18 miles) from St George's, although this is not fully equipped to cope with the seasonal influx of visitors. The new airport at Point Salines, costing an estimated total of US $75m., was completed and opened at the end of October 1984.

Social Welfare

There was no system of social security payments in Grenada prior to March 1979. New initiatives which were launched in 1979 included the Youth for Reconstruction Programme, to provide basic paramedical services and assistance to the elderly and disabled, a national milk distribution programme and the establishment of community-directed day care centres. A national insurance scheme began in 1983. In 1978 there were 25 physicians working in Grenada. In 1980 the country had three hospitals, with a total of 325 beds. A mental hospital, destroyed by military action in October 1983, was to be rebuilt with US financial aid.

Education

Education is free and compulsory between the ages of six and 14 years. The standard of education is high, and the system is modelled, to a large extent, on the British pattern. In 1981 there were 68 primary schools and 20 secondary schools. In 1970 only 2.2% of the adult population had received no schooling. Technical Centres have been set up in each parish, and there is a Technical and Vocational Institute in St George's. The Extra-Mural Department of the University of the West Indies has a branch in St George's, and there is also a Teachers' Training College. A School of Medicine has been established at St George's, a School of Agriculture at Mirabeau and a School of Fishing at Victoria.

Tourism

The colonial architecture of the capital, the excellent yachting facilities and Grand Anse beach are the major tourist attractions. In 1983 Grenada received 82,676 foreign visitors, including 50,217 cruise ship passengers.

The Republic of Guatemala lies in the Central American isthmus, bounded to the north and west by Mexico, with Honduras and Belize to the east and El Salvador to the south. It has a long coastline on the Pacific Ocean and a narrow outlet to the Caribbean Sea. The climate is tropical in the lowlands, with an average temperature of 28°C (83°F), and more temperate in the central highland area, with an average temperature of 20°C (68°F). The official language is Spanish, but more than 20 indigenous languages are also spoken. Almost all of the inhabitants profess Christianity: the majority are Roman Catholics, while about 25% are Protestants. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) has three equal vertical stripes, of blue, white and blue, with the national coat of arms (depicting a quetzal, the 'bird of freedom', and a scroll, superimposed on crossed rifles and sabres, encircled by a wreath) in the centre of the white stripe. The capital is Guatemala City.

Recent History

Under Spanish colonial rule, Guatemala was part of the Viceroyalty of New Spain. Independence was obtained from Spain in 1821, from Mexico in 1824 and from the Federation of Central American States in 1838. Subsequent attempts to revive the Federation failed and, under a series of dictators, there was relative stability, tempered by periods of disruption. A programme of social reform was begun by Juan José Arvalo (President in 1944–50) and his successor, Col Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán, whose policy of land reform evoked strong opposition from landowners. In 1954 President Arbenz was overthrown in a coup led by Col Carlos Castillo Armas, who invaded the country with US assistance. Castillo became President but was assassinated in July 1957. The next elected President, Gen. Miguel Ydigoras Fuentes, took office in March 1958 and ruled until he was deposed in March 1963 by a military coup, led by Col Enrique Peralta Azurdia. He assumed full powers as Chief of Government, suspended the Constitution and dissolved the legislature. A Constituent Assembly, elected in 1964, produced a new Constitution in 1965. Dr Julio César Méndez Montenegro was elected President in 1966, and in 1970 the candidate of the Movimiento de Liberación Nacional (MLN), Col (later Gen.) Carlos Araña Osorio, was elected President after a turbulent campaign. Despite charges of fraud in the elections of March 1974, Gen. Kjell Laugerud García of the MLN took office as President in July.

President Laugerud sought to discourage extreme right-wing violence and claimed some success, although in September 1979 Amnesty International estimated the number of lives lost in political violence since 1970 at between 50,000 and 60,000. In February 1976 a series of earthquakes in central Guatemala resulted in 23,000 dead, 77,000 injured and about 1m. homeless. In March 1978 Gen. Fernando Romeo Lucas García was elected President. The guerrilla movement increased in strength in 1980 and 1981, while the Government was accused of the murder and torture of civilians and, particularly, persecution of the country's indigenous Indian inhabitants, who make up 60% of the population. An estimated 11,000 civilians were killed in 1981.

In the presidential and congressional elections of 7 March 1982, from which the left-wing parties were absent, the largest number of votes was awarded to the Government candidate, Gen. Angel Aníbal Guevara, who was later confirmed as President by Congress. The other presidential candidates denounced the elections as fraudulent. Guevara was prevented from taking office in July by a coup on 23 March, in which a group of young right-wing military officers installed Gen. Efraín Ríos Montt (a candidate in the 1974 presidential elections) as leader of a three-man junta. Congress was closed, and the Constitution and political parties suspended. In June Gen. Ríos Montt dissolved the junta and assumed the Presidency. He attempted to fight corruption, reorganized the judicial system and disbanded the secret police. The number of violent deaths diminished. However, after initially gaining the support of the National University, the Roman Catholic Church and the labour unions and hoping to enter into dialogue with the guerrillas, who refused to respond to an amnesty declaration in June, President Ríos Montt declared a state of siege, and imposed censorship of the press, in July.

The war against the guerrillas intensified, and a civil defence force of Indians was established. The efficiency of the army increased. Whole villages were burnt, and many inhabitants killed, in order to deter the Indians from supporting the guerrillas. Up to 500,000 Indians have been displaced by the war, and many have escaped across the border to Mexico, where refugee camps have been established. President Ríos Montt's increasingly corporatist policies alienated all groups, and his fragile hold on power was threatened in 1982 by several attempted coups, which he managed to forestall.

President Ronald Reagan of the USA was eager to renew sales of armaments and the provision of economic and military aid to Guatemala, which had been suspended in 1977 as a result of serious violations of human rights. Several sales of spare parts for military equipment were made to Guatemala in 1982, despite restrictions by the US Congress. In January 1983 the US Government, satisfied that there had been a significant decrease in the abuse of human rights during Gen. Ríos Montt's presidency, announced the resumption of arms sales to Guatemala and agreed to provide US $6.3m. in military aid for 1983. However, independent reports claimed that the situation had deteriorated, and revealed that 2,600 people had been killed during the first six months of President Ríos Montt's rule. An estimated 100,000 refugees fled to Mexico during early 1983, and relations between Guatemala and Mexico were strained, following further incursions into Mexican territory by Guatemalan security forces, which resulted in the deaths of several refugees. In March the army was implicated in the massacre of 300 Indian peasants at Nahulá, and there was a resurgence in the activity of both left- and right-wing 'death squads'. The President declared a 30-day amnesty for guerrillas and political exiles, and lifted the state of siege which had been imposed in July 1982. Furthermore, he announced the creation of an electoral tribunal to organize and oversee a proposed transfer from military rule to civilian government. In April the army launched a new offensive, which made significant gains against the guerrillas, principally in the rebel stronghold of Petén and the province of El Quiché. In response, the URNG (the main guerrilla grouping) announced a major change in tactics, which gave priority to attacks on economic targets instead of to direct confrontation with the army. The Government's pacification programme comprised three phases of aid programmes, combined with the saturation of the countryside by anti-guerrilla units. The 'guns and beans' policy provided food and medicine in exchange for recruitment to the PAC, a pro-Government peasant militia. The 'roofs, bread and work' phase involved the development of 'model villages', and the 'Aid Programme for Areas in Conflict' (PAAC) was an ambitious rural development scheme.

By June 1983 opposition to the President was widespread, and several attempted coups were reported. Gen. Ríos Montt had alienated the most influential groups within Guatemalan society by his dependence upon a group of advisers which consisted of six young army officers and fellow members of his fundamentalist Protestant church. The President no longer enjoyed the support of the Roman Catholic Church, the conservative hierarchy and the business community, who were angered by his evangelical doctrines, austerity measures and proposed agrarian reform. The increasing abuses of human rights and the continuing existence of secret tribunals had provoked international criticism and damaged US-Guatemalan relations. The shift in power towards the lower ranks of the armed forces had created divisions within the officer corps, and led to dissension. On 29 June the air force and four army garrisons rebelled against the President. They called for a return to constitutional rule and for the dismissal of the President's advisers. Gen. Ríos Montt agreed to both demands but remained unconvincing on the issue of electoral reform. On 8 August 1983 Gen. Oscar Humberto Mejía Victores, the Minister of Defence, led a successful coup against President Ríos Montt.

The new President announced the abolition of the secret tribunals and ended press censorship. In addition, the Council of State was abolished. A 90-day amnesty for guerrillas was announced in October. The amnesty was extended throughout 1984. Urban and rural terrorism continued to escalate, however, and in November 1983 the Government was accused of directing a campaign of kidnappings against the Roman Catholic Church. Following the murder of six USAID workers in northern Guatemala, the US House of Representatives suspended the $50m. in aid which President Reagan had requested for Guatemala in 1984. Nevertheless, the US Administration resolved to provide $24m. in economic aid during 1984. Israel continued to supply arms to Guatemala, and 300 Israeli military advisers were reported to be active in the country. In October Gen. Mejía Victores acted to strengthen his position after rumours of his unpopularity among high-ranking officers. Supporters of Gen. Ríos Montt were sent into exile, and in January 1984 new army reforms were introduced. In accordance with the President's assurance of electoral reform, elections for a Constituent Assembly were scheduled for July 1984.

The start of campaigning for elections to the Constituent Assembly heralded a new wave of political violence. By March 1984 the number of weekly political assassinations had risen to an average of 145. It was estimated that more than 50 people were abducted each week. Reports that the Constituent Assembly would nominate a provisional interim president for the period until 1985 were dismissed by Gen. Mejía Victores, who confirmed that the powers of the Assembly were strictly circumscribed to include only the drafting of a new constitution and the electoral law. Fifteen political parties planned to contest the election in July. Contrary to public forecasts, the centre groups, including the newly formed Unión del Centro Nacional (UCN), obtained the greatest number of votes. Under the system of proportional representation, however, the right-wing coalition of the MLN and the Central Auténtica Nacionalista (CAN) together obtained a majority of seats in the Assembly. In August a directive board, composed of representatives from the three major political parties, began drafting the Constitution. A two-stage presidential election was planned for October 1985, the new President to take power in January 1986.

In 1984 the Government continued to develop its controversial strategy of 'model villages', which entailed the construction of new settlements in isolated locations for Indian communities. Relations with neighbouring Mexico deteriorated in 1984, following an attack in April on a Guatemalan refugee camp situated in Mexico, during which six people were killed. By August 1984 the Organización del Pueblo en Armas (ORPA) had emerged as the most active of the guerrilla groups, operating in San Marcos and Quezaltenango. In October an upsurge of violence in Guatemala City, coupled with unrest in the business sector, gave rise to rumours of government instability and encouraged scepticism at the Government's commitment to holding the forthcoming presidential election. In 1984 the US Government gave military equipment valued at US $2m. to the Guatemalan armed forces. Further military aid of $300,000 was to be allocated in 1985. Under Gen. Mejía Victores, it was estimated that more than 100 political assassinations and 40 abductions occurred each week.

Guatemala remains steadfast in its claims to the neighbouring territory of Belize, a former British dependency. In protest at the United Kingdom's decision to grant independence to Belize, in accordance with a UN resolution of November 1980, Guatemala severed diplomatic relations with the United Kingdom. An agreement between Guatemala and the United Kingdom, signed in March 1981, was rejected by Guatemala in July 1982. Talks resumed in January 1983 but, despite a modification in Guatemalan demands, the negotiations broke down. In November Guatemala announced its support for the maintenance of a British presence in Belize as 'insurance' against a possible take-over by guerrilla forces. Tripartite talks were held in May 1984. In October it was announced that Guatemala and the United Kingdom had agreed in principle to reopen consular relations in an attempt to hasten negotiations on a settlement.

Government

Guatemala is a republic comprising 22 departments. Under the 1966 Constitution, which was suspended in 1982, legislative power was vested in the unicameral National Congress, with 66 members elected for four years by universal adult suffrage. Executive power was held by the President, also directly elected for four years, assisted by a Vice-President and an appointed Cabinet. In June 1982 sole legislative and executive powers were assumed by Gen. Ríos Montt, who was, in turn, deposed by Gen. Mejía Victores in August 1983. Elections for a Constituent Assembly, which would draw up a new constitution in preparation for a return to civilian rule, were held in July 1984. The new Constitution was due for final approval in 1985. Presidential elections were planned for October 1985.

Defence

In July 1984 the armed forces totalled 40,000, of whom 38,000 were in the army, 1,000 in the navy (including 650 marines) and 1,000 in the air force. There were paramilitary forces of 9,500. Military service is by conscription for at least two years. In the early 1980s the Patrullas de Autodefensa Civil (PAC), an anti-guerrilla peasant militia, was established. By 1983 these self-defence patrols numbered 700,000 men. Defence expenditure in 1982 was 92m. quetzales.

Economic Affairs

The economy is predominantly agricultural, with more than one-half of the country's active population working in agriculture, forestry and fishing. The agricultural sector accounts for more than 25% of GDP. Guatemala is Central America's second most important coffee producer. Coffee is the country's leading export commodity, generating about 30% of total export earnings. Following a fall in production in 1983, the 1984/85 harvest was expected to increase to 4.5m. bags (each of 46 kg). Export earnings were expected to increase, from US $332m. in 1983/84 to $485m. in 1984/85. Other major crops are sugar cane, bananas, cardamom and cotton. Production of raw sugar rose to a record 580,321 metric tons in 1982, an increase of 22.4% above 1981. In 1984 exports were expected to total 380,000 tons, generating earnings of $100m. Cotton provided 10% of export income in 1981 but high costs, low world prices, lack of domestic credit and the guerrilla war reduced earnings to $126.4m. in 1981: a fall of 24% from 1980. Adverse weather in September 1981 caused a 35% decrease in output. A further fall was expected for 1982/83 as only 49,000 ha had been sown, compared with 77,000 in 1982. In March 1983 high winds caused $60m. in damage to banana plantations. Agricultural production declined by 6% in 1983. A further threat to the agricultural sector was the guerrilla campaign against economic targets, launched in 1983. Attempts to diversify agricultural production have resulted in increased exports of tobacco, vegetables, fruit and beef. In 1983 Guatemala's meat exports fell because of the suspension of sales to Mexico and a decline in domestic beef production from 92,000 metric tons in 1979 to 52,000 tons in 1983. Under the 'Aid Programme for Areas in Conflict' (PAAC), inaugurated in 1983, the Government hopes to transform the mainly Indian-populated highlands by establishing extensive plantations for the cultivation of fruit and vegetables, which will provide new agricultural products for export. A loan of $130m. has been agreed with the IMF to aid agricultural development and to provide agrarian credit. The IDB is to provide $13.9m. for the development of agricultural technology. Extensive forests provide timber and chicle.

Guatemala's industrial sector is the largest in Central America. Manufacturing contributes about 16% of GDP and provides employment for 16% of the working population. The main branches of industry are food processing, rubber, textiles, paper and pharmaceuticals. Exports of manufactured goods more than trebled between 1972 and 1978, but in 1982 the Central American market collapsed. A shortage of domestic credit and lack of external demand, principally from other CACM members, have cut the sector's growth rate. Private investment has declined because of social únrest, and public investment has been curtailed by austerity measures and the scarcity of foreign exchange. Following the closure of 185 businesses in 1982, more factories were expected to go bankrupt, and many were operating at 50% capacity. In 1984 an estimated 44% of the labour force were unemployed.

Commercial quantities of petroleum were discovered in 1974 and 1975, and the Rubelsanto and West Chinajá fields have reserves estimated at 127m. barrels. In 1983 their output averaged 6,600 barrels per day (b/d). Further deposits were found in 1981 in Alta Verapaz and the Petén Basin: these are being exploited by Texaco, Amoco and Hispanoil. A 50,000 b/d pipeline, linking Rubelsanto and the Caribbean coastline, was completed in 1981. Earnings from petroleum declined from US $24m. in 1980 to $22.4m. in 1981, when the price was $33.80 per barrel. By August 1982 it was $31.40 per barrel. New wells were discovered in 1981 and 1982, and the find at Tierra Blanca is expected to produce as much as 6,000–6,500 b/d. Guatemala remains a marginal producer, with a daily output of 6,600–8,000 barrels from 10 fields. Proven reserves are 22m. barrels, while potential reserves are believed to be 800m.–1,000m. barrels. Although foreign companies have been reluctant to invest in Guatemala, owing to the unfavourable terms offered by the Government and to the guerrilla war, new legislation was introduced in October 1983 to encourage foreign investment in exploration for petroleum. The new law eliminates double taxation and reduces the Government's share of the first 50,000 b/d produced from 45%–55% to 30%. There were plans to build a state-owned petroleum refinery with a capacity of 30,000 b/d, despite an existing surplus of refining capacity. A 300 MW hydroelectric project at Chixoy came into operation in October 1983. There were plans to construct a geothermal generating plant, to be known as Zunil 1.

The Exmibal consortium has invested 224m. quetzales in exploiting the deposits of nickel ore, estimated at 60m. tons, near Lake Izabal at Chalac-El Estor. A refining plant began operating in mid-1977 and, at full capacity, was to have produced 28m. lb. (12,700 metric tons) of nickel per year, but in November 1981 it was decided to close down the mine indefinitely as falling sales, the rising cost of fuel and new taxation had made the venture financially unviable.

Despite the earthquake, Guatemala's GDP rose by 9% in 1976. By 1981, however, the growth rate had dropped to 1%, as a result of low world prices for export crops, and in 1982 GDP fell by 3%. A further fall of 2.5% was recorded in 1983. Tourism, once the third largest exchange earner, had virtually ceased by 1983, with a drop in revenue from $82m. in 1979 to $8m. in 1983. Export earnings fell by 7.7% to US $1,260m. in 1982. Imports increased by 11% to $1,774m. in 1981. The current balance-of-payments deficit increased from $163m. in 1980 to $565m. in 1981, but improved to $224m. in 1983. In 1984 the deficit was expected to increase to $500m. Foreign exchange reserves fell from $653.5m. at the end of 1979 to $137.4m. at the end of 1981 and to only $65m. in April 1983. By October 1984 foreign exchange reserves had increased to $261m. Readily available reserves of convertible currency were estimated at between $25m. and $50m. in 1983. A flight of capital and higher service payments on Guatemala's external debt were responsible for the sharp drop in reserves. Net reserves were in deficit. In 1983, in response to increasing economic difficulties, the Government implemented a series of austerity measures. The budget was cut by 20%, about 3,000 employees were made redundant, and the price of petrol was increased. In September the Government reached agreement with the IMF on a stand-by credit of US $114.8m. Under the terms of the agreement, the Government undertook to reduce the budget deficit and to introduce a programme of tax reforms. Following protests at the 10% rate of value added tax (VAT), the rate was reduced to 7% in October. This decision prompted the IMF to suspend its agreement with the Government. In addition, credit amounting to $360m. was withdrawn by international financing agencies. A resumption of negotiations appeared unlikely, following the Government's reluctance to implement further increases in taxation, including VAT. The existing tax programme was regarded as a failure, having yielded only 40% of the expected revenue. In July 1984 the IMF suspended disbursement of $60m. from the original credit. In September the Government was forced to enact changes in the tax programme to compensate for tax evasion amounting to 100m. quetzales since 1983. In November, after many years of being at parity with the US dollar, the quetzal was partially devalued, when a 'parallel' rate of 1.60 quetzales per US dollar was introduced. In 1985 the US Government was to provide economic aid of US $52.5m. Guatemala's external public debt was $2,000m. in 1984.

Transport and Communications

There were 819 km of railways and 13,632 km of roads in 1984. The chief ports are Puerto Barrios, San José, Santo Tomás de Castilla and Champerico. The construction of a 1,500-km network of new highways, including a four-lane motorway from the capital to San José, began in 1981, and new port facilities are being provided at Champerico and San José. A new international airport was completed at a cost of US $200m. at Santa Elena Petén in 1982.

Social Welfare

Social security is compulsory, and all employers with five or more workers are required to enrol with the State Institute of Social Security, which came under army control in 1983. Benefits are available to registered workers for industrial accidents, sickness, maternity, disability, widowhood and hospitalization. In 1979 there were 819 physicians working in the government health service. A $51m. project to improve health services, including two new hospitals in Guatemala City and one in Antigua, was announced in 1980.

Education

Elementary education is free and, in urban areas, compulsory between seven and 14 years of age. Both primary and secondary education last for six years. In 1980 an estimated 56% of children aged seven to 12 attended primary schools. Secondary enrolment was equivalent to 16% of those aged 13 to 18. There are five universities. The rate of illiteracy was about 50% in 1980, but a 'national literacy crusade' was launched by the Government in 1981 in an attempt to alleviate this problem.

Tourism

The main attractions lie in the mountain regions, with their volcanoes, lakes and mountain villages which remain much the same as in the days of the Maya Empire. The old capital, Antigua, retains the ruins of buildings wrecked in the great earthquake of 1773. The Government is expanding tourist facilities in the Izabal-El Petén region. There are significant Mayan ruins at Tikal, Yaxhá, Nakum and El Mirador. The tourist industry has been devastated by the violence within Guatemala since 1979.

The Constitution

Note: The 1965 Constitution was suspended in March 1982. In December 1984 the Constituent Assembly drafted a new constitution which was due to be approved in 1985.

The present constitution of Guatemala was decreed on 15 September 1965, and took effect on 1 July 1966. Its main provisions are summarized below:

Guatemala has a republican representative democratic system of government and power is exercised equally by the legislative, executive and judicial bodies. The official language is Spanish. Suffrage is universal and secret, obligatory for those who can read and write and optional for those who are illiterate. The free formation and growth of political parties whose aims are democratic is guaranteed. To register, parties must have at least 50,000 adherents, of whom at least 20% must be literate. There is no discrimination on grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, birth, economic or social position or political opinions.

The State will give protection to capital and private enterprise in order to develop sources of labour and stimulate creative activity.

Monopolies are forbidden and the State will limit any enterprise which might prejudice the development of the community. The right to social security is recognized and it shall be on a national, unitary, obligatory basis.

Constitutional guarantees may be suspended in certain circumstances for up to 30 days (unlimited in the case of war).

CONGRESS

Legislative power is in the hands of Congress, which is made up of deputies elected directly by the people through universal suffrage. Congress meets on 15 June each year and ordinary sessions last four months; extraordinary sessions can be called by the Permanent Commission or the Executive. All Congressional decisions must be taken by absolute majority of the members, except in special cases laid down by law. Deputies are elected for four years; they may be re-elected after a lapse of one session, but only once. Congress is responsible for all matters concerning the President and Vice-President and their execution of their offices; for all electoral matters; for all matters concerning the laws of the Republic; for approving the budget and decreeing taxes; for declaring war; for conferring honours, both civil and military; for fixing the coinage and the system of weights and measures; for approving, by two-thirds majority, any international treaty or agreement affecting the law, sovereignty, financial status or security of the country.

PRESIDENT

The President is elected by universal suffrage, by absolute majority for a non-extendable period of four years. Re-election or prolongation of the presidential term of office are punishable by law. The President is responsible for national defence and security, fulfilling the constitution, leading the armed forces, taking any necessary steps in time of national emergency, passing and executing laws, international policy, nominating and removing ministers, officials and diplomats, co-ordinating the actions of Ministers of State. The Vice-President's duties include presiding over Congress and taking part in the discussions of the Council of Ministers.

ARMY

The Guatemalan Army is intended to maintain national independence, sovereignty and honour, territorial integrity and peace within the Republic. It is an indivisible, apolitical, non-deliberating body and is made up of land, sea and air forces. The President of the Republic is General Commander of the Army.

LOCAL ADMINISTRATIVE DIVISIONS

For the purposes of administration the territory of the Republic is divided into departments and these into municipalities, but this division can be modified by Congress to suit interests and general development of the Nation without loss of municipal autonomy.

JUDICIARY

Justice is exercised exclusively by the Supreme Court of Justice and other tribunals. Administration of Justice is obligatory, free and independent of the other functions of State. The President of the Judiciary, judges and other officials are elected by Congress for four years. The Supreme Court of Justice is made up of at least seven judges. The President of the Judiciary is also President of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court nominates all other judges. Under the Supreme Court come the Court of Appeal, the Administrative Disputes Tribunal, the Tribunal of Second Instance of Accounts, Jurisdiction Conflicts, First Instance and Military, the Extraordinary Tribunal of Protection. There is a Court of Constitutionality presided over by the President of the Supreme Court.

GUINEA

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Guinea lies on the west coast of Africa, with Sierra Leone and Liberia to the south, Senegal to the north, and Mali and the Ivory Coast inland to the east. The climate on the coastal strip is hot and moist, with temperatures ranging from about 17°C (62°F) in the dry season to about 30°C (86°F) in the wet season. The interior is higher and cooler. The official language is French, but Soussou, Manika and six other national languages are widely spoken. Most of the inhabitants are Muslims but some still adhere to traditional animist beliefs. There are a few thousand Roman Catholics. The national flag (proportions 3 by 2) consists of three equal vertical stripes, of red, yellow and green. The capital is Conakry.

Recent History

Guinea was formerly French Guinea, part of French West Africa. It became the independent Republic of Guinea on 2 October 1958, after 95% of voters had rejected the Constitution of the Fifth Republic under which the French colonies became self-governing within the French Community. The new state was the object of punitive reprisals by the outgoing French authorities: all aid was withdrawn, and the government infrastructure destroyed. The administration was rebuilt on the basis of the Guinean Confédération Général du Travail, which had organized a series of strikes culminating in a general strike in 1953, and the Parti démocratique de Guinée (PDG), which won 58 of the 60 seats in the Territorial Assembly in 1957. Its leader, Ahmed Sekou Touré, became President, and the PDG the sole political party. President Sekou Touré vigorously pursued a policy of socialist revolution, with emphasis on ideology and popular political participation.

There were attempted coups in 1961, 1965 and 1967. An invasion by Portuguese and Guinean exiles in 1970 was repulsed, after which there were many arrests. As a result, diplomatic relations with Senegal and the Federal Republic of Germany were broken off in 1971, and with the Ivory Coast in 1973. This led to the country's virtual isolation, as dealings with the USSR had declined since the early 1960s. Reports of a 'permanent conspiracy' by foreign powers to overthrow the Government continued to circulate, but in 1975 Guinea resumed normal relations with its African neighbours, France and the Western powers, signing the Lomé Convention (see p. 149) and joining ECOWAS (see p. 134).

All private trade was forbidden in 1975, and transactions were conducted through official co-operatives under the supervision of an 'economic police'. In September 1977 demonstrations against the abolition of the traditional market, and the abuse of power by the 'economic police', were held by women in Conakry, and rioting broke out in other towns. Three state governors were killed. As a result, Sekou Touré gave way to many of the demands expressed, disbanded the 'economic police' and allowed private trading to recommence.

Under Sekou Touré's regime, opposition was ruthlessly crushed and by 1983 almost 2m. Guineans were estimated to have fled abroad. Allegations of widespread violations of human rights were repeatedly denied by the Government. However, between 1977 and 1978 nearly 1,000 prisoners were released, while Guinean exiles were encouraged to return. In November 1978, at the 11th Congress of the PDG, the membership of the central organs of the party was increased to allow the expression of new opinion, and the merging of the functions of party and state was announced. The country was renamed the Popular and Revolutionary Republic of Guinea. The President reiterated Guinea's commitment to socialist aims but expressed its desire for co-operation with Western investors. In December 1978 President Giscard d'Estaing made the first visit by a French President to independent Guinea, and plans for economic co-operation between the two countries were discussed. During 1979 Guinea furthered relations with other countries, and there was a general move away from rigid Marxism. Private enterprise became legal in July 1979, subject to strict conditions.

In legislative elections, held in January 1980, the voters approved the list of 210 candidates to the National Assembly. Presidential elections were held in May 1982, when Sekou Touré was returned for a fourth seven-year term of office. In 1982 the President visited the USA, Canada and France. The French visit indicated a rapprochement in relations with France, and took place despite the protests of various Guinean exile groups. In November 1983 Sekou Touré was re-elected Secretary-General of the PDG during the 12th Party Congress.

A series of earthquakes hit northern Guinea in late 1983, killing about 275 people and destroying the towns of Gaoual and Koumbia. In January 1984 a further plot to overthrow the Government was discovered, when a group of 20 mercenaries were arrested in southern Senegal. It was reported that thousands of Guineans were subsequently detained, accused of complicity in the coup plot.

In March 1984 Sekou Touré died while undergoing heart surgery in the USA. On 3 April, before Touré's permanent successor had been chosen by the PDG, the Guinean armed forces seized power in a bloodless coup. A Comité Militaire de Redressement National (CMRN) was appointed, headed by Col Lansana Conté. The PDG and National Assembly were dissolved, and the Constitution suspended. The CMRN affirmed their support for the OAU and the country's principles of non-alignment, and pledged to restore democracy and to respect human rights. Hundreds of political prisoners were released, and a lifting of press restrictions was announced. The country's original name was restored, replacing the 'Popular and Revolutionary Republic' which had been adopted as a title in 1978. A delegation led by the Prime Minister, Col Diara Traoré, toured West African states to rally support from Guinea's neighbours, and in June Col Traoré visited several European countries in an effort to attract foreign investment and to consolidate relations, particularly with France. By July 1984 an estimated 200,000 Guinean exiles had returned to the country.

Trials of former politicians, most of whom had been detained since the coup in April, began in November 1984. Following allegations of corruption and rivalry within the CMRN, President Conté extensively reshuffled his government in December 1984, personally taking over the posts of Head of Government and Minister of Defence. The post of Prime Minister was abolished, and Diara Traoré was demoted to Minister of National Education.

Government

The 1982 Constitution, providing for a National Assembly elected by universal adult suffrage, was suspended following the coup in April 1984. A Military Committee for National Recovery, with 25 members (subsequently 20) assumed power. The President of the Republic is assisted by a Council of Ministers. In December 1984 the President also became Head of Government. Local administration is based on eight provinces, each under the authority of a provincial governor. Provincial administrative councils meet every three months. District and Neighbourhood councils were to be set up in early 1985.

Defence

In July 1984 Guinea had an army of 8,500, a navy of 600 and an air force of 800. Paramilitary forces numbered 9,000, including a People's Militia of about 7,000. Military service is compulsory. Defence expenditure in 1981 was 1,710m. sylis.

Economic Affairs

Under Sekou Touré, a centralized socialist economy was set up, with direct state control of production and consumption in every sector except mining. The economy was supervised by five sectoral companies, responsible for all state enterprises.

The military government which took power in April 1984 announced a liberalization of the economy, although certain state enterprises were to be maintained. Agriculture was proclaimed the Government's absolute priority. More than 80% of the population are engaged in farming, the principal export crops being bananas, groundnuts, oil palm, citrus fruits, pineapples and coffee, though they contribute less than 5% of total exports. Food crop production in 1982 was estimated at 400,000 tons of rice, 620,000 tons of cassava and 67,000 tons of maize. In the past, Guinea was a net exporter of food grains, but currently is obliged to import substantial quantities. Only 1.4m. of the 7m. cultivable ha are productive but there are plans to bring a further 48,000 ha under cultivation. Drought during the 1970s caused severe crop failure, necessitating food aid from the USA. A farming programme that was drawn up in 1979, based on 200 state collective farms, failed to reverse Guinea's agricultural decline. In July 1984 the new government attempted to boost agricultural production by raising the producer prices of agricultural products, which had remained fixed at the same level since 1974. A programme has been launched to develop rice-growing in the Siguiri area; the scheme includes rehabilitation of 7,000 ha of rice fields and aims at least to double the current annual yield of 700 kg per ha. Foreign investment is being sought to develop the large areas of arable land as yet unexploited, and EEC aid has been granted for rural training and a variety of agro-industrial projects. There are plans to develop the fishing sector, with the proposed construction of a fisheries centre and port at Conakry. Manufacturing contributes only around 4% of GDP, and is based mainly on the processing of local raw materials. During the 1960s and 1970s, many industrial units operated at under 25% capacity. In late 1984, a new industrial plan and investment code were being drawn up, providing for the substantial participation of foreign and local private investment.

Guinea's most important foreign-currency earner is mining, which contributes about one-quarter of the country's GNP. The country possesses large bauxite deposits, accounting for an estimated one-third of the world's high-grade reserves. Output rose from 2.6m. tons in 1972 to an estimated 13m. tons in 1980, and is scheduled to reach 20m. tons per year by the late 1980s. Production fell in 1981 and 1982 to an estimated 11.2m. tons per year because of a slump in world demand for aluminium. Three sites are at present being exploited: Boké, Fria-Kimbo and Kindia-Debele. The first two plants accounted for 98% of government revenue in 1981. Bauxite is processed into alumina by the Friguia company. Production of alumina rose from 489,000 tons in 1963 to 708,000 tons in 1980, but declined in the following two years, to 578,000 tons in 1982. There are plans to increase annual capacity to 1.3m. tons. At present, Cameroon processes much of Guinea's alumina to produce aluminium. The Mount Nimba iron-ore mine has reserves estimated at 1,500m. tons. A mixed company, in association with the Government of Guinea, is mounting a project to extract 5m. tons per year from 1985, increasing to 15m. tons from 1988. Original investment plans included the construction of a railway of 1,200 km (750 miles) to the mine, a steelworks and a second deep-water port near Conakry to export the ore. Plans have been postponed or scaled down, however, due to the depressed world market for steel. Meanwhile, the ore is to be exported through the Liberian port of Buchanan. Diamond mining was suspended in the late 1970s, owing to smuggling and theft from the mines, but resumed in 1980, when the Government allowed investment by two multinational companies. In May 1984 the Aredor diamond mine, in south-east Guinea, came into production, with annual output forecast at 250,000 carats, rising to 1m. carats in 1987. A company was set up in November 1984, jointly owned by the Government and private investors, to exploit diamond mining in Kouroussa province. Guinea also has considerable hydroelectric resources. The Yugoslav Government has financed the construction of a 100 MW hydroelectric dam on the Bafing river, and there are plans to build a 350 MW complex on the Konkouré river, but financing for the project has not yet been settled. In 1982 an international consortium was formed to study Guinea's uranium deposits, and there is exploration for petroleum offshore.

Despite its mineral wealth, Guinea is among the world's poorest countries. In 1981, according to World Bank estimates, Guinea's GNP per head was US $300 (at average 1979–81 prices), having increased at an average rate of only 0.2% annually, in real terms, since 1960. Overall GNP rose by 3.1% per year over the 1970–80 period. The first development plan (1960–64) was largely financed by Eastern bloc countries, but since then more assistance has been given by the West. At the end of 1978 Guinea's total foreign debt was $1,050m., servicing of which absorbed 27% of export revenue in 1979. Export earnings were estimated to be $220m. in 1981, but total foreign debt had risen to $1,255m., while the cost of petroleum imports amounted to $80m. in 1981. Debt service payments totalled some $83m. in 1981, and were forecast to exceed $133m. in both 1982 and 1983. Export growth has been hindered by the country's seriously overvalued currency, which has encouraged smuggling and black marketeering. Guinea's possible return to the Franc Zone (see p. 154) was under consideration in 1985.

In 1980 Guinea became a member of both the Mano River Union (with Sierra Leone and Liberia) and the Gambia River Development Organization (with Senegal and The Gambia), thus strengthening economic links with the rest of West Africa. Sekou Touré's policy of 'positive neutrality' has been continued by the military government: agreements on aid and co-operation were signed in 1984 with a number of countries, including the USSR, the People's Republic of China, Morocco and Saudi Arabia. US aid totalled $9m. in 1984, while France provided 77m. French francs, mainly in support of education, agriculture and transport projects.

Transport and Communications

The principal port is Conakry. Bauxite is exported through Kamsar, where a port was opened in 1973. There are rail links between Conakry and Kankan, Kamsar and Sangaredi, and Conakry and the Friguia aluminium factory. New lines are planned to transport iron ore from near the Liberian border to the coast. There is an international airport at Conakry. There are about 28,400 km (17,650 miles) of roads, mostly soft-surfaced. A cross-country road runs 895 km (556 miles) from Conakry to Bamako, the capital of Mali, and an international road crosses Guinea, connecting Dakar, the capital of Senegal, with Abidjan, the capital of the Ivory Coast. The construction of a 303-km bituminous road from Guekédou to N'Zérékoré, scheduled for completion in 1988, will connect the forested south-eastern region to the internal road network.

Social Welfare

Wages are fixed according to the Government Labour Code. A maximum working week of 48 hours is in force for industrial workers. In 1976 there were 314 government hospitals and dispensaries, with a total of 7,650 beds. In 1977 there were an estimated 300 physicians working in Guinea.

Education

Education is free at every level. Primary education, beginning at seven years of age and lasting for six years, is officially compulsory. However, estimated enrolment at primary schools in 1980 was equivalent to only 33% of the relevant age-group. Secondary education, from the age of 13, also lasts for six years. University education is divided into two stages of two and three years, often interrupted for periods of practical experience in the chosen field. In 1965 adult illiteracy rates were 86% for males and 96% for females. Under the six-year transitional education plan announced in June 1984, political education was eliminated and French was adopted as the language of instruction in schools. Teaching of the eight national languages was to continue, however. Private schools were legalized in 1984, after 23 years of being banned under the regime of the late President Sekou Touré.

Tourism

Guinea is noted for the beauty of its scenery, especially in the mountains of the Futa Djalon, but the country receives few tourists.

GUINEA-BISSAU

Introductory Survey

Location, Climate, Language, Religion, Flag, Capital

The Republic of Guinea-Bissau lies on the west coast of Africa, with Senegal to the north and Guinea to the east and south. The climate is tropical, although maritime and Sahelian influences are felt. The average temperature is 20°C (68°F). The official language is Portuguese, but Crioulo and several dialects are widely spoken. The principal beliefs are animism and Islam. There is a small minority of Roman Catholics and other Christian groups. The national flag (proportions 2 by 1) has two equal horizontal stripes, of yellow and green, and a red vertical stripe, with a five-pointed black star at its centre, at the hoist. The capital is Bissau.

Recent History

Portuguese Guinea (Guiné) was settled by the Portuguese in the 15th century. Small nationalist groups began to form in the 1950s, and the Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde (PAIGC) was formed in 1956. Fighting broke out in the early 1960s, and by 1972 the PAIGC was in control of two-thirds of the country. In 1973 a National Assembly was elected in 'liberated' areas, and the independence of the Republic of Guinea-Bissau was proclaimed in September, with Luiz Cabral as President of the State Council. To combat the PAIGC's guerrilla campaign, about 40,000 Portuguese troops were operating in the territory. Portuguese forces began to sustain heavy losses in 1973–74, and this may have been a factor in the military coup in Portugal in April 1974. This coup brought the fighting to an end, and in August the new Portuguese Government and the PAIGC negotiated an agreement to end Portuguese rule. Accordingly, on 10 September 1974, Portugal recognized the independence of Guinea-Bissau.

The PAIGC regime introduced measures to lay the foundations for a socialist state. At elections held in December 1976 and January 1977 voters chose regional councils from which a new National Assembly was later selected. In July 1978 Francisco Mendes, who had been Chief State Commissioner since 1973, died; he was replaced by Commander João Vieira, the former State Commissioner for the Armed Forces and President of the National Assembly.

Until 1980 the PAIGC supervised both Cape Verde and Guinea-Bissau, the two constitutions remaining separate, but with a view to eventual unification. However, on 14 November, four days after the Government had approved a new constitution which gave President Cabral almost total control and, some claimed, gave unfair preference to Cape Verdeans (who were permitted to hold top administrative and government posts), Cabral was deposed in a coup and Vieira installed as Chairman of the Council of the Revolution.

At the PAIGC Congress in November 1981 it was decided to preserve the single-party status of the PAIGC, with Vieira as Secretary-General, despite Cape Verde's withdrawal. Diplomatic relations between the two countries were restored after the release of Cabral from detention in January 1982. Vítor Saúde Maria, former Minister of Foreign Affairs and Vice-Chairman of the Council of Ministers, was appointed Prime Minister in a government reshuffle in May, the post having been vacant since the 1980 coup; several ministers who were regarded as left-wing lost their portfolios.

In March 1983 President Vieira set up a commission, headed by the Minister of Justice, to examine plans for the revision of the constitution and the electoral law. In March 1984 President Vieira dismissed the Prime Minister, Vítor Saúde Maria. Although the reason given for his dismissal was alleged involvement in a planned coup, the differences between Vieira and Saúde Maria appeared to centre on the proposed constitutional changes, which would abolish the post of Prime Minister and concentrate more power in the hands of the President. Several other top party members were subsequently accused of colluding with Saúde Maria and were expelled from the PAIGC. In April President Vieira formally assumed the role of Head of Government. Elections to the regional councils were held in April, and the National People's Assembly was re-established in May, its members being chosen from the regional councillors. The 15-member Council of State (Cabinet) was selected from the members of the National Assembly, and Vieira was elected as President of the Council and Head of State. The National Assembly immediately ratified the new constitution, and formally abolished the position of Prime Minister.

Government

In November 1980 a new constitution, giving President Cabral greatly-increased powers, replaced that of 1973, which had proclaimed the PAIGC, the only permitted political party, to be 'the supreme expression of the sovereign will of the people'. Following the overthrow of Cabral, the 150-member National People's Assembly and the Council of State Commissioners were dissolved, and their functions were assumed by the Council of the Revolution, presided over by Vieira. However, in May 1984 the country returned to democratic rule: a new constitution was adopted, and the National People's Assembly and the Council of State were reinstated.

Defence

In July 1984 the armed forces totalled 6,050 men (army 5,700, navy 275, and air force 75). The army is supported by a militia, the Forças Armadas da Libertação, which totalled 5,000. Defence expenditure in 1981 was 307.9m. pesos.

Economic Affairs

Subsistence agriculture is the mainstay of the economy, engaging about 80% of the population. Rice is the staple food, and maize, beans, cassava and sweet potatoes are also grown. Groundnuts, coconuts and palm kernels are exported, providing about 41% of export earnings in 1980. Cattle-breeding is important in the interior. The Government plans to make the country self-sufficient in essential foods, to increase production for export and to diversify crops; tobacco, cotton and sugar are being grown experimentally. Co-operative farming methods are being introduced. The fishing industry is being modernized and has expanded rapidly; in 1980 fish products made up 33% of export earnings.

Industry, based on the processing of food and raw materials, is being developed in order to provide employment, to reduce imports and to satisfy consumer demand; however, only timber is exported. The agro-industrial complex at Cumeré is capable of processing 50,000 metric tons of rice and 70,000 tons of groundnuts annually. The mining sector has still to be developed: the exploitation of bauxite, phosphates and petroleum deposits is being studied. In 1984 the Government reached agreement with a group of foreign oil companies concerning petroleum prospecting in a 4,500 sq km offshore concession. However, there is a serious lack of basic infrastructure and transport facilities. To help to rectify this situation, Guinea-Bissau was granted a US $16m. loan from the World Bank in 1983 to finance the modernization of the port of Bissau and the rehabilitation of four river stations. Other plans include the construction of a dam on the Corrubal river, to supply hydro-electric power for the development of a modern aluminium industry, and a major road rehabilitation project. In 1983 Guinea-Bissau joined the Organisation pour la Mise en Valeur du Fleuve Gambie in the hope of benefiting from integrated development projects in the Gambia river basin.

Since independence the country has had a serious trade deficit, which has increased since 1977 because of the effects of the drought on crops, rising oil prices and world inflation, and stood at $33.4m. in 1982. The annual rate of inflation rose from an estimated 9% in 1977 to 30% in 1981. In recent years, Guinea-Bissau's gross national product (GNP) per caput has declined by an average annual rate of 1.7% in real terms, and in 1982 GNP per caput was estimated at US $170. Commander Vieira's Government aimed to downgrade many of the prestigious projects begun under President Cabral and to emphasize rural development. The need for co-ordination was recognized and the first development plan (1983–86) was drawn up in 1982. An international donors' conference on Guinea-Bissau, held in May 1984, raised US $60m. towards projects in the development plan. In December 1983 the peso was devalued by 50% as part of an economic stabilization programme launched by the Government. The programme aimed to liberalize trade and to increase activity in the private sector. Guinea-Bissau is receiving many foreign loans and credits and is a member of ECOWAS (see p. 134).

Transport and Communications

In 1983 there were 2,500 km of roads, of which 400 km were tarred. Plans have been made for an international road to link Guinea-Bissau with The Gambia and Senegal. There is an international airport at Bissalanca. The main port is at Bissau, and transport on the network of inland waterways is being developed.

Social Welfare

Medical services are limited, owing to a severe shortage of facilities.The Government aims to set up one regional hospital in each of the eight regions. In 1978 the Government operated 10 hospital establishments, with a total of 910 beds. In 1979 there were 88 physicians working in the country.

Education

Education is officially compulsory only for the period of primary schooling, which begins at seven years of age and lasts for six years. Secondary education, beginning at the age of 13, lasts for up to five years (a first cycle of three years and a second of two years). In 1981 the enrolment ratio at primary schools of children in the relevant age-group was estimated to be 100% for boys but only 53% for girls. The comparable figures for secondary schools in 1980 were 6% for boys and 2% for girls. Mass literacy campaigns have been launched but, according to UNESCO estimates, the average rate of adult illiteracy in 1980 was 81.1% (males 75.4%; females 86.6%).

Tourism

There is very little tourism in Guinea-Bissau, but the island of Bubaque is being developed as a resort.

The Constitution

A new Constitution for the Republic of Guinea-Bissau was approved by the National People's Assembly on 16 May 1984. Its main provisions are summarized below:

The Constitution defines Guinea-Bissau as an anti-colonialist and anti-imperialist Republic and a State of revolutionary national democracy, based on the people's participation in carrying out, controlling and directing public activities. The Constitution states that the party that fought against Portuguese colonialism, the Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde (PAIGC), shall be the leading political force in society and in the State. The PAIGC shall define the general bases for policy in all fields.

The economy of Guinea-Bissau shall be organized on the principles of State direction and planning. The State shall control the country's foreign trade.

The representative bodies in the country are the National People's Assembly and the regional councils. Other State bodies draw their powers from these. The members of the regional councils shall be directly elected. Members of the councils must be more than 18 years of age. The National Assembly shall have 150 members, who are to be elected by the regional councils from among their own members. All members of the National Assembly must be more than 21 years of age.

The National Assembly shall elect a 15-member Council of State, to which its powers are delegated between sessions of the Assembly. The Assembly also elects the President of the Council of State, who is also automatically Head of the Government and Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces. The Council of State will later elect two Vice-Presidents and a Secretary. The President and Vice-Presidents of the Council of State form part of the Government, as do Ministers, Secretaries of State and the Governor of the National Bank.

The Constitution can be revised at any time by the National People's Assembly on the initiative of the deputies themselves, or of the Council of State or the Government.
